There is Garfield at New Orleans—the man that asks to preside in the chief office of this great nation. There is Garfield sitting in the inner room in the Custom House, where the light of day and the judgment of the American people was cut off, and receiving the evidence that turned the parish of West Feliciana, and examining them as though he were a lawyer in the case, and so he swears, "When I had completed that I felt a great deal of anxiety to see the men who had testified if I could." It was not enough to read the evidence as it had been fixed up for the negroes and the whites, but it was more than that. "I confess I felt a good deal of surprise and astonishment at the revelations contained in these documents. That I went there with not a little apprehension that there must be a good deal of lying in t e papers of both sides connected with the election. I made inquiry and found that a considerable number of these witnesses were in the city. I made out a list of perhaps one-half or three-fourths of the names of the witnesses whose testimony I had examined, and inquired for them and procured interviews with them. I sat down with them and asked them to tell me in their own way the stories of their relation to the election. I cannot name all these witnesses with whom I conversed, but some of them I remember distinctly. Mrs. Amy Mitchell (I shall have something to say about her directly), the young woman whose husband had been killed during the progress of the registry or election. I also remember Judge Duall, a parish Judge whom I examined in the same way. "As to the result of the examination." Mark this. "As to the result of the examination, of course, it was entirely unofficial; it was conversation of my own with these witnesses. I draughted some interrogatories to draw out more fully from some of the witnesses the testimony which they had given rather in brief, and some of the interrogatories which subsequently were appended to the testimony of these witnesses." Now, notice what he has sworn to: That he occupied that room, and that when the testimony was all handed to him relating to the parish of West Feliciana, he examined it and the testimony, and he made out a list of one-half or two-thirds of the witnesses, and he sent for them one by one. He examined them, and when their testimony was not as full as he desired, he prepared additional interrogatories, which went, in some cases at least, before the Returning Board. This comes really very close around the Journal and Garfield. "The summary in the testimony in the case of West Feliciana was prepared by me." A little further about what he did:

"Some of these affidavits I notice in the West Feliciana case were made after you arrived in New Orleans. Did you have anything to do with them yourself—in taking them? A. Nothing, except that in some instances, as I have already related, I prepared interrogatories."

The next witness was Geo. Swayzee.

"Q. Do you remember talking with him? A. Yes, sir; I do remember talking with Swayzee. I think interrogatories were prepared for him after my conversation with him. I don't think I prepared them, but there was a l r e affidavit in the case that I read. I talked with him, and then after that these interrogatories were filed. In the printing, they were printed instead of the original. I talked with Swayzee. I saw his testimony was not very full, and, after my conversation with him, interrogatories were propounded to him necessarily to bring out his evidence in full, and that evidence, in answering the interrogatories, was the evidence of Swayzee that was printed.

"The next man, Napalus, I remember well, for he had a very striking story of having been partly hung, and having been dragged with a rope around his neck. He was one of those to whom interrogatories were propounded after the filing of the first affidavit." Now, gentlemen, he mentions as the most remarkable case in which he prepared the questions for the witnesses, the case of Amy Mitchell, so I will read what Garfield swore to in regard to that case.

"Q. As regards the case of Amy Mitchell, which made an impression on you, can you tell whether it was before or after you were furnished with a copy of her affidavit that you had this conversation with her? A. It was afterward. It was the reading of the affidavit that impressed me, and I asked to have her sent to me.

"Q. I see that the affidavit appears to have been sworn to the 30th of November? A. I advised them to take a fuller statement by interrogatories from Amy Mitchell, and I think I propounded a portion of the interrogatories. The preliminary statement, the simple affidavit, was earlier."

Now, gentlemen, I will turn over a page and see what the case of Amy Mitchell was. [Turning the leaves of a book.] She first made an affidavit in the Custom House, where she was examined privately by James A. Garfield. That affidavit was not full enough. He prepared additional interrogations to be propounded to her, and she answered those interrogatories, and, in her testimony before this same committee, she afterward swore that there was no truth in the statement given in response to Garfield's interrogatories. In answer to a question propounded by Gov. Cox, of Ohio, who is a Republican, Amy Mitchell said—she repeated her direct testimony—that every statement contained in the affidavit was false; that she did not say anything because she knew it, but said what they told her to say. Her testimony also showed that she had been trained in the Custom House to testify before the committee. I don't say that Garfield was present when she swore to the answers to interrogatories, but he prepared the interrogatories that were answered, and he prepared the interrogatories after he had an interview with that colored woman, when there was no person besides themselves present; and the same woman comes before the committee of Congress, not in an inner room, not when the light of God's day is shut off, but she comes before the committee of Democrats and Republicans, and in that testimony, given under oath and under the test of a cross-examination by the Republican members of the committee, she says there was not a word of truth in the testimony which she gave in answer to Garfield's questions. The next purpose, gentlemen, I have in mind is to ask why did Garfield spend eighteen days in the inner room of the Custom House? Why did he have private interviews with the colored and white people whose testimony was to be taken to be used before the Returning Board? and why did he prepare interrogatories for witnesses? I will answer in his own words:

"Q. But don't you understand that in the cases where you suggested that interrogatories should be prepared instead of the evidence, they were to go before the Returning Board? A. Yes, sir."

And when his work of taking the testimony was completed he turned his attention to the preparation of a brief. A brief, as you all know, is a lawyer's argument in writing. I will show you what he says upon that subject on page 797 of the report:

"Q. Was that brief furnished to the Returning Board? A. No, sir. That brief was never furnished to anybody but the President of the United States. In fact, a considerable portion of the brief was written on the cars on my way to Washington.

"Q. Written after you left New Orleans? A. A considerable portion of it. I had written a summary of the evidence before that, but a considerable portion of the brief was written in pencil on the cars after I left New Orleans on my way home."

You see he completes the evidence. He is the only man that prepares it for West Feliciana after the evidence had been turned over to him, and when he has done that work on his way from New Orleans to Washington he prepares an argument in the case. I wish to connect directly this transaction with the duties of the man who takes the solemn oath to deal fairly. It is your duty as a member of the commission to deal fairly. The next question is, what did Garfield do in regard to Louisiana? That we find on page 803. I say he knew that Louisiana was Democratic by 8,000 majority when he sat in that inner room and had private conversation with the witnesses, and prepared interrogatories to guide and control their testimony; when he was at that work, and when he was writing a brief to make it appear the other way, he knew that Louisiana had cast a Democratic majority of 8,000, and here is his sworn testimony on that subject:

"Q. Did you get any idea how the vote of Louisiana stood from the returns? A. I had all those ideas that could be got from the newspapers and the leaders of the different parties. We had had, of course, very full information of that sort.

"Q. Presuming that there were not some parishes to be thrown out by the Returning Board, it was very clear that the State had gone for Nicholls and Tilden, was it not? A. It was very well understood by the time I got there that, if nothing but the face of the returns was to be considered, and if every vote sent up was to be considered a legal vote, Mr. Tilden was ahead.

"Q. If every vote sent up was a legal vote, and some more Republican votes were not found, it was very clear that the State had gone for Nicholls and Tilden? A. Yes."

There is your man, Republicans, that you propose to place in the chair that Washington occupied. It will never be done. No man with a record like that ever took that chair, and in the kind providence of an eternal God it will never occur. He knew by the returns that Tilden for President and Nicholls for Governor were elected in the State of Louisiana, and yet, when he knew that, he says when he got to New Orleans he staid there eighteen days, and all that he did was to sit in that inner room, where no one could find him except they passed from the public hall through another room, and there, alone with poor, ignorant witnesses, he prepared interrogatories, and talked with them, and that those interrogatories and that talk went to the Returning Board and furnished the scoundrels of that board the pretext to return against the truth that Tilden was beaten in Louisiana. Do you suppose that this man was to return to Washington and become a juror and decide whether Tilden or Hayes was elected, and to decide between man and man whether Hendricks or Wheeler was elected Vice President. He says, on page 798; "I heard of nothing of the kind—that is, of a decision then made. I don't think any of our party had heard of it, for we left in great anxiety as to what the result would be." Then a little further down he says: "We went away from that meeting, and within perhaps three hours from that time, at least by the first train after that, we left New Orleans. I know there was great anxiety among us all as to what the result would be, and we had no word or hint of it until we had passed Bellaire on Tuesday morning, when a dispatch was received addressed to some of our number, perhaps to Senator Sherman, giving us the first intimation of the conclusion of the Returning Board." And what do you, fair-minded men that have from time to time taken your seats upon the jurors' box, what do you think of the man that is to come on to Washington to try the cause?

Being anxious in his mind as he leaves New Orleans, and all the way from that city until he reaches Bellaire, until he reaches Ohio, he is in a great state of anxiety, and then a dispatch comes at lightning speed, "The work is done," "The work is done," and there is no anxiety thence on forever! The perjury and the forgery is committed. The people of the United States have been beaten in their might and majesty and in their glorious sovereignty at the ballot-box. They have been beaten like the old lion who had his paws entangled in the meshes of the net. The great people of the United States are beaten, and a part of the work was done in that room, and forever from this time infamous room in the Custom House, and this is the evidence, gentlemen. John C. New, you that stand high as a citizen of Indianapolis, this is the evidence that I quoted in my speech at Marion. And I gave page and document so full that if you wanted the truth you cannot fall into error, and here is what I said in that original speech: "Garfield's testimony commences at page 789," and here it is; you can come and look for yourselves (referring to the book), "Document 31, Accompanying Report No. 140, House of Representatives, third session, Forty-fifth Congress." If that is not in detail, why it is more specific than the conveyancer describes a piece of land in a deed or will. Now, to-morrow morning, let him who wrote the article this morning come down upon his knees and pray God's pardon, and go to the Journal office and do justice to a neighbor; aye, more than that—do justice to himself; aye, more than that—do justice to the intelligent sentiment, and judgment of the people of Indianapolis, that he addresses every morning. He knows now where the evidence is; and will he now repeat what he said this morning? A little further; (looks at a book) I can't find it—(here it is); if you are on to a thing you will always find it if it is there, and we Democrats are going to stick to this man until he is sorry he was ever nominated. He may understand that there is now encircling him a popular judgment and a public conscience that is more terrible than the fate that awaits the wicked. Here is what the Journal says: "If this can be substantiated, then Garfield would be disgraced." How stands he now? How is he between you and me—between your intelligence and your consciences and minds? Aye, more than that: How is it between you and yourselves? Is he disgraced? "Unless Mr. Hendricks can substantiate the charge he is disgraced."

I have accepted the issue without fear, and I stand here in the presence of my neighbors. I thank God and your intelligence, I am not disgraced. "Mr. Hendricks offered no proof of the charges in the Marion speech, and has none, since he cannot produce any. The charge is unsupported by any evidence worthy of belief," and the evidence is Garfield himself. This is harder on Garfield than anything I ever said. Now, gentlemen, this man, that thus came and conducted himself at the city of New Orleans, and helped to prepare the case, and helped to get a false return from a false and perjured Returning Board; and he came on his way North as far as Bellaire, and was overtaken by the lightning informing him and his co-conspirators, as he sat in the palace car, of the decision that they had procured in the city of New Orleans. I know how a lawyer feels when his case has been submitted. I know the anxiety which drives sleep and quiet away when life or property may depend upon the result made by the jury. But surely I never expressed myself in regard to that anxiety, as Garfield did when he said they left New Orleans very anxious about the result, and when the result came all anxiety disappeared. His work was completed, and an honest return was defeated. He came on to Washington, and then what do you think he did when there was a bill proposed in Congress—the bill that did finally pass—to appoint a commission composed of five members of the House and five members of the Senate and five members of the Supreme Court to hold a conference upon this great issue? When that bill was pending, Garfield got up and said, "No, it must not be;" and here are the reasons that he gave. Let me give you, in his own words, if I can. It is in very fine print and difficult to read. Speaking of the bill then pending in Congress, he says—this was on the 25th of January; he got back to Washington by the 2d of December, and the bill came up for consideration in the House whether this commission should be appointed to pass upon the right of President and Vice President, and Garfield, opposing this bill, uses this language: "It assumes the right of Congress to go down into the colleges and inquire into all the acts and facts connected with their work. It assumes the right of Congress to go down into the States to review the act of every officer, to open every ballot-box, and to examine every ballot cast by 7,000,000 of Americans." That was Garfield's objection to the bill—that if it did pass, and these fifteen men were appointed under the law, it would be their duty to go back of all technicalities and returns, and to pass upon the real fact of the case; to go into the ballot box and see how the votes were, and to decide the case upon the real truth. And after that, when the bill passed and he became one of the fifteen, he voted every time that they should not open the door to investigate, but that the law closed the door, and said that Kellogg's certificate and the certificate of the Returning Board was stronger than law and the constitution and the judgment of Congress. And his vote was the eighth vote against seven that decided that they should not go behind the Returning Board. What would you think of me as a lawyer if you would hear me express my opinion upon a question of law? I have no doubt about it, and address the honored court and say it was the law, well fixed and decided, and the next day I came to be a member of the tribunal to pass upon individual and public right according to law, and that next day I say what I said before is not the law, and I decide against you upon the statement of the law different from that I had made the day before. As Mr. Julian said, when he stood in the House it was Garfield speaking, but when he was upon the commission it was the party demanding power, money and office. Let me read you this oath he took. I take it from Mr. Julian's speech: "I, James A. Garfield, do solemnly swear that I will impartially examine and consider all questions submitted to the commission of which I am a member, and a true judgment render thereon agreeable to the constitution and the laws, so help me God." They say he is a preacher. I don't pretend to anything but a wicked lawyer—that's all; but there is not wealth enough in the State of Indiana to get me, in my place in the House or in the Senate of the United States, to say: If you pass this law I hold that it opens the door to investigation, and we can go down to New Orleans and ascertain how the vote was in fact, and then after I go upon the commission to turn around and say that the Returning Board and its findings is conclusive upon us, and we cannot investigate at all. I would not do it for a thousand years of tenure in the great office for which he is a candidate. I state to you that whatever the truth might be about the De Golyer pavement, whether he did take a fee against the interest of the Government when he was a Representative receiving a salary, whatever the facts might be about the Credit Mobilier, whether it was a terrible fraud or not, I will not stop to speak of that until this great question is settled: Whether as a representative of the people, as a juror sitting between myself and Wheeler and Tilden and Hayes, he was a true man or a false man. And, if I have a case in your court, and you are called upon as a juror, and no questions are asked you at all, and you have a bitter prejudice against me, and that there is no verdict at all except against me, would you go and take your seat? Would not it come up to you?

My oath would not allow me to do it, and I know that yours would not. Yet Garfield, after he had helped to make up the case down in New Orleans, comes to Washington, and, without protest or apology or excuse, he takes his seat and he votes day after day contrary to what he said in the House was the law. No, gentlemen, he will never be President of the United States. He is a man of ability, and the more ability such a man possesses the worse it is for the office. I don't want him, because when I have a President in Washington, whatever his politics may be, I want to feel that he is as much my President as yours, and as much yours as he is mine, and that as President he is free from those prejudices and passions which pervert the judgment and destroy opinion. Now, gentlemen, I have occupied your attention longer to-night than I expected to. Now I will repeat that when I took my breakfast this morning I had no thought of addressing you. It was not a part of the programme of the business of the day at all. When I saw that the Journal said that if I did not make this good I was disgraced, and if I did, then Garfield was disgraced, then, gentlemen, as soon as I saw that I longed to see you and speak to you with more earnestness and feeling than ever I longed to before. If I have failed in any one of the questions presented by the Journal, I know it not. I have appealed to no witnesses except Garfield himself, and by Gen. Garfield is Garfield this night disgraced. You fair-minded Republicans and gentlemen that love your country better than you do the Journal, better than you love Garfield, better than you love combinations of party, I appeal to you now by this test. Publicly I have said that if the short-hand reporter is not here for the Journal, I have a report of my speech to-night, and I will furnish it to the Journal and ask that it appear, and if it does not appear to-morrow morning, then it is admitted as though it was written in the broadest and brightest capitals, "We can't stand upon the issue we made yesterday morning." If they don't publish what I have said to you to-night, not in an inner room, but in this temple, then you may know that they admit that Thomas A. Hendricks is not disgraced, but that James A. Garfield is disgraced.

GARFIELD'S DE GOLYER RECORD.

HE DECLARES THAT HE MADE AN ARGUMENT BEFORE THE BOARD OF PUBLIC WORKS.

[From His Speech at Warren, Ohio, Sept. 19, 1874.]

Mr. Parsons came to me and said he had an important case; he had worked a good while on it, but was called away. He must leave. He did not want to lose his fee—was likely to lose it unless the work was completed. He asked me if I would argue the case for him; if I would examine into the merits of this pavement and make a statement of it before the board.

I made the argument.

[From the Same Speech at Warren.]

The question was, if the people want the wood pavement and are determined to have it, which pavement shall we give them, the best, or not the best? Now, I have before me here, what I had when I made the argument, certificates from Chicago, St. Louis, San Francisco, and all the other cities where the pavement was laid, that it stood better than any wood pavement that had ever been laid.

[From the Same Speech.]

A committee of investigation went over the whole ground of this business in Washington. Mr. Parsons went before that committee and told them all he knew about this pavement; told them what he knew of its merits and told them he and I argued that case.

GEN. GARFIELD SWEARS THAT HE ARGUED THE CASE BEFORE THE BOARD.

Mr. Nickerson—I understand you to say, Mr. Garfield, that you prepared a brief after Mr. Parsons went away, and that you filed it with the Board of Public Works. Is there such a brief on file?

Mr. Garfield—My impression is that I filed it, though I am not certain. I know that I stated to the Board of Public Works the points of the case.

The Chairman—You did make an argument?

Mr. Garfield—I made a careful study of the case, and I stated the points to the members of the board.

Mr. Nickerson—Did you ever meet the board collected together as a board, and make any statement or argument on the subject?

Mr. Garfield—I don't know whether the members of the board were all there or not.

Mr. Nickerson—Did you at any time appear before the board and make any arguments whatever?

Gen. Garfield—I do not remember that I did; but I did speak to Gov. Shepherd on the subject, giving my opinion in its favor.

THE TRUTH ABOUT GEN. GARFIELD'S "ARGUMENT."

[From Alexander R. Shepherd's Testimony Before the Same Committee.]

Q.—You say, speaking of the influence of Parsons, "That was followed by frequent pressures by Mr. Parsons, and Gen. Garfield spoke to me about it once." Is that your best recollection now, that that was all that was done by Mr. Garfield?

Mr. Shepherd—That was all that he ever did. He never spoke to me but once on the subject.

WHY PARSONS WAS EMPLOYED TO EMPLOY GARFIELD.

[From Benjamin R. Nickerson's Testimony before the Investigating Committee.]

I was the owner of the ironizing process. I was to ironize the pavement and have a royalty. My interest in it was worth $60,000 or $70,000, at least, and Mr. Parsons was employed with the assurance to me by Chittenden that he was able to reach the man who could secure the contract.

AND WHY GARFIELD WAS EMPLOYED.

[From a Letter to De Golyer and McClelland from their Agent, George R. Chittenden, May 30, 1872.]

The influence of Gen. Garfield has been secured by yesterday, last night, and to-day's labors. He holds the purse-strings of the United States; is Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and the strongest man in Congress. I can hardly realize that we have Gen. Garfield with us. It is sure success and very gratifying, as all the appropriations of the District must come through him.

A REPUBLICAN OPINION OF THE TRANSACTION.

[From The Independent, July 30, 1874.]

The testimony taken in the investigation of the District of Columbia frauds shows that Mr. Garfield received $5,000 for his aid in getting through a paving contract accepted by the District Government. A Mr. Parsons, a notorious jobber, made an argument for the paving company, and then got Mr. Garfield to make a further argument and to use his personal influence in its favor. Of course Mr. Garfield's argument was successful. How could it be otherwise? He was Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. Every cent of money voted to the District had to come through him. Shepherd could not refuse him anything he asked, and Mr. Garfield knew it when he asked and received for his services a fee which would have been grossly extravagant but for his official position.

GEN. GARFIELD DENOUNCED BY HIS CONSTITUENTS FOR TAKING THE DE GOLYER BRIBE.

We further arraign and charge him with corrupt bribery in selling his official influence as Chairman of the Committee on Appropriations for $5,000 to aid the De Golyer pavement ring to aid them in securing a contract from the Board of Public Works of the District of Columbia; selling his influence to aid said ring in imposing upon the people of said District a pavement which is almost worthless, at a price three times its cost, as sworn to by one of the contractors; selling his influence to aid said ring in procuring a contract to procure which it corruptly paid $97,000 "for influence;" selling his influence in a matter that involved no question of law, upon the shallow protest that he was acting as a lawyer; selling his influence in a manner so palpable and clear as to be so found and declared by an impartial and competent court upon an issue solemnly tried.

A CONSTITUTIONAL REPLY.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

The charge is made in many of the Republican journals, and is really believed by some people, that the election of Gen. Hancock to the Presidency would disturb things; that it would mean the payment of the rebel debt, reimbursement for emancipated slaves, payment of rebel claims and general cussedness. This is the Republican argument of this campaign. It has been the Republican argument of each political canvass for fifteen years. It would seem that the argument might some time wear out, but, though this garb is worn, it is still worn. The Republican debaters, on the stump and in the press, have, really, no other argument. In some of the organs of the Republican party this line of argument, this attack upon the purposes of the people of the South, is so vicious and malignant as to make those organs the malicious enemies of the business prosperity of their own neighborhoods and the enemies of real union in this country. The growing prosperity in the Southern States is the most considerable source of the growing prosperity of the country. The four great cities that compete for the Southern trade know this, New York, Baltimore, St. Louis and Cincinnati are not ignorant of the fact. Productive and purchasing ability have enormously increased in the Southern States. Three of these four Northern cities treat the Southern people as though they were citizens of the same country, with whom enlarged commercial relations would be agreeable. In this city, which is geographically a Southern city, and which has recently been moved into the heart of the South, which is the largest Southern city, and the closest to the Southern people, the attempt is made, for political effect, to treat the Southern people as enemies and traitors and public robbers. Republican orators and organs and manipulators prate about the payment of the rebel debt, of rebel claims, and recompense for slaves that were emancipated, etc. This is the strongest, and really the only Republican argument in this canvass. These are the things it is alleged the Democratic party will do on gaining possession of the Executive Department of the Government, and it is not alleged that in any other way the Democratic party could or would disturb the peace and harmony and business of the country. The entire Republican campaign for the Presidency rests upon this assertion, which is called an argument.

What is the reply? To say that the statement is an unmitigated lie should be a sufficient reply. All men should know this. To point to the conduct of the House of Representatives, which has been Democratic for six years, and to the conduct of the Senate, which has been Democratic for two years, should be a sufficient reply. Democratic legislation has produced public economy, and has been followed by universal prosperity, the prosperity that laughs over the land to-day. But there is still another answer, a constitutional answer, a final answer. The crimes it is alleged the Democratic party will commit are impossible. It is beyond the power of the Congress or the Executive to do these things. The Fourteenth amendment of the constitution of the United States declares:

"The validity of the public debt of the United States authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations and claims shall be held illegal and void."

This is the constitutional reply.

Patriotic Letter from Gen. Hancock.

Indiana and Ohio united in a great Democratic rally at Hicksville, Defiance county, Ohio, near the Indiana line, on the 17th of September. The monster gathering was addressed by Senator Thurman, Gov. Hendricks, and other distinguished gentlemen. The following letter from Gen. Hancock was read at the meeting:

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, NEW YORK HARBOR,
Sept. 12, 1880.

Messrs. A. P. Edgerton, Benj. Patton, and Others,
Hicksville, Ohio.

GENTLEMEN: Accept my thanks for your invitation to Hicksville, Defiance county, Ohio, on the 17th inst. The meeting will be one of unusual interest, honored as it will be by the presence of those two prominent leaders as Senator Thurman and Gov. Hendricks. The cause must be one of no ordinary kind that brings together those eminent men on the borders of the two great States of which they have long been distinguished representatives. I have reason to feel proud of being prominently identified with a cause that is upheld by the patriotism and ability of such advocates. I regret that I cannot be present on this occasion to share with my fellow-citizens the lessons of wisdom and patriotism that cannot fail to emanate from such sources. I feel assured that the proceedings of the meeting will enforce the people's demand for honesty, economy and efficiency in the public service, for the peace and welfare of the country, for the security of free institutions, and for all the rights and liberties of the citizen as guaranteed by the constitution and the laws. Let us hope that the masses of the people, whose interests stretch away beyond the schemes and temporary triumphs of mere partisan warfare, will take affairs into their own hands and properly settle the question as to whether we shall have a new era of peace, reconciliation, economy and prosperity. I am very truly yours,

WINFIELD S. HANCOCK.

Mr. Irish, who is to speak at the democratic rally in Butler, Oct. 11th, is the same gentleman who created such a favorable impression in Fort Wayne on the evening of the 22d inst. Concerning his speech at that place, the Fort Wayne Gazette (republican) says: "Mr. Irish, at once established himself a favorite with the aud'ence and spoke for over an hour and a half. The Iowa editor possesses great powers of mimicing, keeping his hearers in continuous roars of laughter. His recital of the negro telling how the republicans would hold them (the negroes) up between themselves and the fire, was humorous in the extreme, while his narrative of Hancock's victory of Gettysburg was a thrilling piece of eloquence. His shots at Senator Conkling were neat and effective, and his allusion to Col. Bob Ingersoll, would, as bits of humor, take rank with Bret Harte, Mark Twain and the more pretentious humorous lecturers. The democracy have in Mr. Irish an able champion, and one who should be found in better company.

SMOKE THIS.

EDITOR COURIER:—The last issue of the Republican states that the republicans did not scourge and murder men for expressing their opinion, like the democrats did. I will ask the Republican if it remembers the year 1863, when they held a political meeting at the little village of Butler Center, and appointed three of their league to warn two honorable democrats, Zeb Miller and Levi Houser, to leave the country within ten days or the wouldy hang them, for expressing their democratic sentiments? And also, whether it remembers the time when the republican home-guards came down from Noble county to the Center to drill, or, to speak the truth, to slaughter the honest democrats who had fortunately escaped the draft? When the day's doings were over, and the marauders were on their way home, they passed the residence of Mr. J. P. Wyant, and seeing a man standing in the door, singled out their best marksman to kill the d—d copperhead, as they called him. The republicans are now trying to make democrats responsible for these terrible outrages, and are endeavoring to lay their blood-stained crimes on the democrat's hands.

A. CARPER.

MR. HIRAM BARNEY, collector of the port of New York, is out for Hancock. Mr. Barney is an old free soiler. He says: "I believe that the republican party has accomplished its purpose and is now existing only because of its office-holders." "Further," he said, "that the cry of a new rebellion and southern disloyalty was the last wail of the republican party; that the Tribune of to-day disgraces the memory of Horace Greeley, and that Hancock's administration will be the most noticeable since the time of Jackson."

BEFORE the election in Maine the republicans discussed the size of the majority simply, and ackowledged that, if they did not get a substantial majority, it would be a defeat. Now, gentlemen, if you do no stick to your assertions, you will be reminded of them often enough to make the people remember that you made them.

Rob. J. Lowry is Dead.

With quivering lips and sore heart we make this announcement, and never in our life were we called upon to perform a sadder duty. His death will cause a pang in many a heart and a silent tear to fall from many an eye, for "none knew him but to love him, or named him but to praise." To us who, with slight interruption, have been intimately associated with him since the early part of 1877, the first two years on the Bentonville (Ark.) Advance, words are inadequate to even faintly express our sorrow. We knew his many virtues better than most people, and we loved him as a brother. When Death reaches out his cold hands and takes from us one so loved, so kind, so tender, so noble and so true, and one who had so much to live for, we are almost led to doubt the wisdom and justice of such a dispensation. He possessed all those qualities of mind and heart which make a noble, kind, lovable manhood, and his heart was always touched by the beautiful and good. He loved his friends. Rob. was one of God's gentleman, and as such his memory will ever be cherished by every one who knew him.

Robert Jillson Lowry, only son of Judge Robert Lowry, was born in Goshen, Indiana, February 22, 1854. He died last Monday, September 27, about twelve o'clock, after the most intense suffering from an obstruction of the bowels. He was past his 26th year. When he was quite young the family moved to Chicago where they lived but a short time, and moved to Fort Wayne where they have ever since resided, and where he was reared. It was there that he received his first lessons in the printing business, in every department of which he had gained great proficiency, and his correctness in all details was wonderful. After a two years' sojourn in the south, where he was known as a brilliant writer and a young journalist of more than ordinary promise, he returned home, and on April 1, 1879, purchased a half interest in this paper from Mr. Theodore Reed, and was associated with that gentleman as one of its editors and publishers, Mr. Reed retiring the 20th of last July, the junior partner became sole editor and proprietor, which position, with its many arduous duties, he ably and faithfully filled up to the time of his death. He loved his chosen profession, and had he been permitted to live, would without doubt, have obtained a high position in journalistic ranks.

He professed faith in Christ and said he was willing to die. To-day a vast number of mourners, many from Auburn and other points, followed his remains to Lindenwood cemetery, the beautiful City of the Dead in Fort Wayne, where, with tears and love, they were laid to rest.

Noble Rob! Thou art gone and forever. No more, will thy manly form be seen on the streets of Auburn; no more will thy familiar voice be heard. In thy death a void is made in the hearts of loving parents and devoted sisters, as well as in our own and others, which can never be filled. Farewell! Farewell!

"Bright be the place of thy soul!
No kindlier spirit than thine
E'er burst from its mortal control,
In the orbs of the blessed to shine.
On earth thou wert tender and kind,
And thy soul shall immortality see;
Thus our sorrows should cease to repine,
When we know that thy God is with thee.

Light be the turf on thy tomb;
May its verdure like emeralds be!
There should not be a shadow of gloom
In aught that reminds us of thee.
Young flowers and an evergreen tree
May spring from the spot of thy rest;
But no cypress or yew let there be,
For why should we mourn for the blest?

Though called home in man's early prime,
Thou hast gained a far lovelier clime,
Ne'er ending bliss time cannot destroy.
Let us ever remember thee, then,
As clothed in perennial youth,
In mansions not builded by men,
But eternal and lasting as Truth."

U. S. GRANT wants the republicans to have control of the government until we can have two national parties. That point, we respectfully submit, has been and passed. The republican party has had control for twenty years. Now there is only one national party, and that is headed by Winfield Scott Hancock. The other is sectional. It has abandoned the campaign in the south, and the million and a half men who voted its ticket now held an average increase of nearly 8 per cent. annually. During this period the state of Georgia has been under unquestioned democratic control, and while there has doubtless been oppression and wrong in the treatment of the negro, as there always will be in the case of a race slowly learning how to defend itself, thrifty accumulation of property, slow but sure, tells its own story of advancing prosperity.

Such facts as Mr. Barnes furnishes with regard to the condition of the colored man in Georgia under democratic rule explains why thousands and tens of thousands of colored men vote the democratic ticket in the south. The colored men know that republicans rob them when an opportunity offers, while democrats labor to improve their condition. What is true of Georgia is equally true of other southern states, in so far as the purpose of the white people to help the colored man is involved, and the letter of Mr. Barnes at once exposes the vile slanders of the republican press and of republican orators.

"REBEL CLAIMS."

General Hancock's Manly Answer to the Silly, Solid Republican Wail.

That the Democratic Party and Its Leaders Favor the Payment of

The Confederate War Debt, the Claims of Southerners and Pensions for THOSE WHO WORE THE GRAY.

CINCINNATI, Sept. 20.—To Gen. W. S. Hancock, Governor's Island, New York.—Dear Sir: I inclose slips cut from the Gazette and Commercial of this city, both of them newspapers of large circulation and influence in Ohio and Indiana, referring, as you will see, to a much harped upon subject in our politics of rebel claims. These newspapers and republican stump-speakers are constantly asserting that if you are elected president the claims of disloyal people of the south, for losses sustained in war, will be allowed and paid by the United States. They further direct special attention to the fact that this charge has been made against the democratic party, and that you, its candidate for president, have not denied it. This warfare is made in all seriousness and maintained with great earnestness, and repeated day after day in the press and speeches. You are known to the country as a frank, honest soldier, now the representative of the democratic party, and having a right to speak for it. Whatever you may say the people will hear and believe. I submit the matter to your judgment as to what you shall say, or whether you should make any utterance at all. Very respectfully yours,

THEO. COOK.

REPLY OF GEN. HANCOCK.

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, N. Y., Sept. 23.—To Theodore Cook, Esq., Cincinnati, Ohio.—Dear Sir: Your letter of the 20th instant has been received. I regret that you are disturbed about that bugbear, "southern war claims." The people cannot be misled by it. To suppose that "rebel claims," or claims in the interest of persons who were in the rebellion, can in any way, or in any degree, be countenanced is an imputation of disloyalty—such as used to be made against the democrats even when they were in arms defending the country. So far as it touches me I denounce it. The government can never pay a debt or grant a pension or reward of any sort for waging war upon its own existence, nor could I be induced to approve or encourage the payment of such debt, pension or reward. Nobody expects or wants such unnatural action; to propose it would be an insult to the intelligence and honor of our people. When the rebellion was crushed the heresy of secession in every form and in every incident went down forever. It is a thing of the dead past; we move foreward, not backward. If I were president I would veto all legislation which might come before me, providing for the consideration or payment of claims of any kind for losses or damages by persons who were in the rebellion, whether pardoned or not. In relation to Union war claims, the government's obligations to its defenders come first; they are lasting and sacred. The public laws of civilized nations do not in general recognize claims for injuries to property resulting from the operations of war. Nevertheless our government has treated with great indulgence the claims for losses and damages suffered by Union men from the military operations of the war of the Union; but as hostilities were closed more than fifteen years ago, claims of that nature, now in the hands of brokers or persons other than the original sufferers, are becoming stale and in my judgment might fairly be considered as barred by the lays of time, and if hereafter entertained at all, should be subjected to the strictest scrutiny. Yours very truly,

W. S. HANCOCK.

Local and Miscellaneous

—Hi. Raceley, of Garrett, was in the city Monday. He says the republicans down there are tame; in fact real docile and will stand by the hour and let a democrat rub them down without any back talk.

—H. H. Stamets will leave this week for South Chicago, and engage in the commission business. Mr. Stamets is a live business man and we are confident will make a success of his new undertaking.

—This seems to be a very favorable time in the year for the "doubling-up" business or we are no judge. We have had no less than five weddings in our immediate neighborhood, and we learn there are still more brewing. What terrible times these are!

—Ed. Foltz, a lad who is old enough to know better, run a buggy into the sprinkling wagon, last week, and demolished a wheel. He done the principal part of the driving with a whip—which he handled as nimbly as a school marm does a pointer.

—Those boys who mistake Saturday nights for the Fourth of July, and fill their carcasses full of that "peace-disturbing fluid," had better peruse the ordinance made by the town dads last week. It may save them carrying a thirty-pound ball around on the streets.

—Tuesday afternoon, about 3 o'clock Cooper Ralston, while busily engaged in his store, was seized with an apoplectic stroke and was taken to his residence, on Seventh street, in a very prostrate condition. He is much better, however, at the present writing.

—It will soon be time for the teachers' institutes to begin. We hope the secretaries will send in the proceedings kind o' light on the start, as we lost a subscriber and another man moved west on account of an abundance of this matter each week, last winter. Again we warn you, go aisy.

—Mr. McNagny, of Columbia City, made a telling speech in behalf of Hancock and English to a large audience at Ensley's hall last Friday evening. He could not understand how it was that the "rads" called Gen. Hancock a rebel and Gen. Longstreet a loyal soldier. We don't see ourself what arithmetic they figure that from.

—At the democratic rally in Avilla, last Saturday, several republicans, who like to be termed fighting-cocks, managed, through their insults, to rile up the blood of some of the boys and a fight ensued. The republican pugilists were most beautifully whipped and they left for home early, sadder and we hope wiser men.

—Who furnishes Dan. Thomas with $5 notes to set 'em up to the b'hoys? Everyone says it is not Dan's money, and what everybody says must be true. And then we know, too, that that way of doing has never heretofore been Dave's custom. Wonder if DeKalb's wonderful detective has a finger in the pie?

—Treasurer Gonser has moved his family to their old home in Fairfield township. Mr. G. will join them ere long and live a life of quietude and ease, away from the noise and business cares of city life. Mr. Gonser has been a faithful public servant, always ready and willing to favor the poorer class of our tax-payers. We will miss him as a citizen as well as an official.

—RALLY.—Let every democrat remember that next Saturday is the day set apart for the democratic rally. This will probably be the last gathering before the election, and we would like to see an immense crowd. Good speakers have been engaged, bands and marshal music will enliven the occasion, and take it all in all it will be a fair day for the weary tiller of the soil to enjoy a day of rest and listen to the political issues of the day.

FLUKE'S CORNER.—How familiar that rings in our ears. Year after year has passed and that vacant spot has been an eye-sore to every enterprising citizen of Auburn. There have been many and large offers made for this piece of ground, but Mr. Fluke, the owner, did not have to accept any of them—he was too well healed. Now, however, a change has taken place—the ice has been broken, so to speak, and workmen are now laboring tearing up the soil of this apparently deserted spot and laying the foundation preparatory to erecting a brick structure thereon. Time accomplishes many wonders.

—Charley Hoff stepped in to while away a few leisure moments with John Knoder, the gunsmith, Monday. Casting his eyes about the shelving he spied a nice, innocent looking little Colt's "gevolver" and Charley proceeded to investigate its good and bad qualities. His first move was to raise the hammer, the second to tickle the triger, and the third to break for a physician—he shot himself through the hand. He dispatched a servant for Dr. Casebeer, and when the doctor arrived at the store Charley was at his office. The last we saw of the performance, Charley was looking for the doctor and the doctor was looking for Charley, and so on.

HERE AND THERE.

A Few Items Caught on the Fly by our Reporter.

—Any man that will sell Geo. Foster whisky is not deserving of any patronage.

—Mr. Benner, of Wilmington township, will have a public sale the 9th of Oct.

Johnny Hartman, our honest, faithful John, has the court yard looking splendid.

—Sunday last was a dreary, disagreeable day, and the promenaders were few.

—If it don't make any difference to the marshal, we'll have a few new crossings.

—John Birk has built an addition to his dwelling. He now has a commodious house.

—John Kreuger has put in a force-pump and made other improvements to his ashery.

—Isaac Roth feels at home now. He has his dray line in running order. Patronize him.

—W. P. Meyers, principal of our public school, has been quite ill for several days past.

—The doctors are haying their harvest now. There is considerable sickness at present.

—We are under obligations to the Whitley County Agricultural Association for favors.

—Dr. J. H. Ford will build a brick addition to his store-room as soon as workmen can be had.

—The school-house near S. Kutzner's north of town, will have to be repaired before school begins.

—The DeKalb County Republican's portable peanut stand is staked down at Angola this week.

—Dr. T. G. Matheny is renovating his residence and will soon have a new house out of his old one.

—S. H. Snyder left Thursday last for Ann Arbor, Michigan, where he will resume his studies at the college.

—Orwin Shaffer is a victim to the bilious fever, which has kept him in the house for several days.

—The band boys have decided to "change their tunes," having just received a number of new pieces.

—John Robbins, of Auburn, spent sabbath last in this city, the guest of Geo. W. Lackey.—Garrett News.

—Picker & Bumpus have finished their brick contract at Garrett, and will commence work here next week.

—Mrs. Little receives new goods every week, and when you want the latest styles be sure to give her a call.

—The buckwheat crop is said to be good this season. It makes a fellows mouth water just to think about it.

—The Seventh-street bridge is again passable. At least we notice a number of teams crossing back and fourth daily.

—Our schools are in a flourishing condition and parents seem to be satisfied with the progress made by their children.

—Mike Long was home Sunday about three hours. He can make a more extended visit after the presidential election.

—Mrs. Spencer Dills and Mrs. Haskill, of Butler, were visitors at S. W. Ralston's Monday and Tuesday, this week.

—Frank Davenport has touched up the outer walls of his store-room with a coat of paint. Foltz & Co., did the work.

—Simon Ochs, in connection with the store of Isaac Ochs, will buy wheat and pay the same prices as does Butler or Waterloo.

—Ed. Eldridge has had a coat of T. Baldock's patent roofing put upon his building. They say it's a good roofing process.

—Jacob Hoover, the delinquent tax-collector, is around after the boys in a lively manner. The time is up for delinquents.

—Jeff. Grube went to Cincinnati last week, but will return in time to blow the "hollow stick" in the marshal band next Saturday.

—The Land Company's agent at Garrett, W. J. Frederick, Esq., is erecting five frame dwellings in the western portion of that village.

—We have completed several card jobs for our lady friends this week. They all know where to go for the late styles and best work.

—Frank Ray, the devilish, nasty Frank, cut his foot, last week, and now when John says, "come to your father, chile'" he don't run from him.

—The COURIER office is quiet and down-hearted this week. The whole corps of employes are lamenting over the death of their editor and friend.

—Frank McDowell was called home from Ann Arbor, Mich., where he has been attending school, to the bed-side of his sister, who is dangerously ill.

—Mrs. F. and J. Picker will visit Columbia City next week, spending a few days with relatives, and also attend the fair. Two birds with the same stone, you see.

—We heard a republican government official remark, the other day, that "the mail department should be conducted outside of political parties." Ha, ha!

—Chris. Baldock looks lonesome up in Davis' tin-shop all alone. He has one consolation, however, and that is, he's boss of the whole 'shooting-match' himself.

—We noticed our humble servant, John Bunch, going down Main street, the other day, in one of Buck Allen's best top rigs. The top was laid back, however.

—There will be communion services at the Lutheran church on Jackson-st., next Sabbath a.m. Rev. R. L. Delo, of Springfield, Ohio, is expected to assist the pastor.

—As Dr. Tritch was driving across the high grade, near Philip Grube's, last Saturday night, the whole out-fit was upset, the doctor receiving a bad bruise on his hip.

—Its whispered around here and there that Martin, alias Geo Line, has received a back pension amounting in the neighborhood of $1,000. Yes, yes, Mr. Martin; call again.

—The Waterloo fair begins next week and extra arrangements are being made to make it more inviting this year than heretofore. Of course large crowds will attend each day.

—And now the country school-teacher is looking out for a winters' sit. School-teaching is nice, but the boarding 'round is generally objected to by the experienced ones.

—A rural chap with sad eye, and his anatomy overflowing with old rye whisky, was given free lodging in the cooler last night. From the appearance of his face something must have struck it—probably the sidewalk flew up.

COUNTY CANDIDATES.

D. D. Moody, for representative, is a man of sterling integrity, good habits and honest, and will make a splendid representative for the people.

John W. Baxter, for county clerk is a man well deserving the position. The people have tried Mr. Baxter and know him to be the right man in the right place.

Lafe J. Miller, for treasurer, is acknowledged by all to be one of the best and most deserving candidates before the people. He'll go in a-whoopin'.

J. J. Van Auken, for sheriff, is the very man that is wanted for this office. He is always wide-a-wake, a profound thinker, and Sheriff Van Auken sounds well.

M. Boland, for recorder, is a man in every respect worthy re-election. He has satisfied the public generally and proved himself an honest, faithful servant of the people. How can the position be improved.

A. P. Foltz, for surveyor, is a hard-working man, and in every way deserving of the office he aspires to. Lend him a helping hand.

James Latson, for coroner. We hardly know what to say for Uncle Jim. Everybody knows he has a sterotyped vote for that office, and comment is useless.

E. Shipe, for commissioner, is highly spoken of by all who know him, and he will undoubtedly be elected by a large majority.

We have more good qualities of these men to speak of, but time will not permit us to do so at this writing. We shall, however, have more to say between now and election day. Every true democrat should vote this ticket straight, as a more untarnished lot of candidates were never before presented to the intelligent voters of old DeKalb Think well, then, we ask of you before casting your ballot.

—We would call the attention of our readers to the advertisement of Isaac Ochs. He means business, and it will pay you to call.

—Austin & Co., are out with an advertisement this week. Look over the paper until you find it.

—Mr. J. J. Van Auken, of DeKalb county, democratic candidate for Sheriff, paid a visit to the county jail to-day.—Fort Wayne News.

—Another hickory pole was raised to-day, by the young democracy, at the corner of Main and Tenth streets. It is a neat pole and the boys deserve credit for their energy.

—The Whitley County Agricultural Association will hold their seventh annual fair at Columbia City, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, Oct. 5, 6, 7 and 8.

—Mr. McMichael and May Bell will be married this evening at the residence of the bride's parents, on south Jackson street. A number of invited guests will be present on the occasion.

—W. H. Silberg, of Lansing, Mich., has been visiting his parents at Spencerville for several weeks, and on his return home gave the COURIER a call. He is solid for Hancock and English.

—W. H. Dills informs us that preparatory to re-entering the practice of his profession, he has engaged a new and eligible room for an office on Main street, where he expects to be found on and after Nov. 1 next. tf.

Waterloo Fair Attractions.

The circassian sisters, the only ones ever on exhibition in America, 9 and 11 years old and perfect marvels of beauty. Also the little prodigy, a little girl only eight-years old, plays all kinds of musical instruments, at the same time; playing the soprano on the violin and accompanying herself on the other three instruments. These novelties will be on exhibition at the Waterloo fair by Prof. Stuart, of San Francisco. Everybody should see them.

—Remember that Schaab, Beugnot & Co., deliver goods to all parts of town free of charge.

—Another invoice of the latest styles in wall-paper just opened up for sale at the Physicians' drug-store, just the thing for fall papering. Call and examine for yourselves. 40-2t.

—Those of our subscribers who proposed to pay their subscription in wood, are hereby notified that a small "invoice" would be very acceptable just about now

—There will be a large crowd at Garrett, Oct., 9. Democrats from all over the county are requested to be present. Garrett is famous for drawing large crowds, and we may look forward for a gala day.

—The nobbiest hats in town can be found at the mammoth double store of Schaab, Beugnot & Co.

—The excursion last Tuesday to the Cincinnati exposition, under the auspices of the Catholic church of this place, was a grand success. About 270 persons accompanied it, 19 of whom were from Auburn.

—Up to this writing, Tuesday Sept. 28, there has been no frost to speak of. If you are anxious to find out about the time old Jack is to make his first appearance, consult Uncle Jacob Grogg; he'll inform you.

—The children who have been reared under republican rule raised a pole last week, at the corner of Main and Tenth streets. A boy speech was delivered in the evening by Willie McLoughan—the brains of the Republican office.

—Schaab, Beugnot & Co. can and will sell you dry goods, clothing and notions cheaper than any other house in northern Indiana.

—The people of DeKalb county should feel highly flattered in being honored by the presence of so distinguished a gentleman as Honorable J. R. Doolittle, ex-United States senator from Wisconsin, who will speak in Auburn next Saturday. Men of all parties should turn out and hear him.

—Please bear in mind the only night demonstration to be made by the democrats of DeKalb county will be at Garrett, on the evening of October 9. The rallies at Auburn and Butler will be during the day with no demonstration in the evening as was at first intended.

—Hon. John McSweeney, of Ohio, has been invited to address the people at Butler on the eleventh of October.

—See the grand array of speakers for the Garrett and Butler meetings, as announced in another column.

—Get your torches ready for the grand demonstration at Garrett, Saturday evening, Oct. 9. No speaking in the afternoon.

—The best of tooth powder to be had at Casebeer & Matheny's drug-store. 40-2t.

THE BACHELOR'S PROPOSAL.

BY CARRIE A. W. WHITE.

Bachelor's Button stood by the wall,
Under an apple-tree shady;
He smiled across the garden-bed
To pretty Miss Ragged Lady.

"Fair lady," said he, "for many a day
I've studied your numerous graces
With so much zeal that I've come to feel
That yours are the sweetest of faces.

"Some nimble fingers I greatly need
To keep my buttons in order,
And you need some one to buy a dress
With a little less tattered border.

"So now if you'll come and live with me,
And sew on my buttons neatly,
From bonnet to slipper I'll dress you out
Most elegantly and completely!"

Said Ragged Lady, "'Tis fine to hear
You talk about pretty faces!
A judge of beauty you are indeed
Who can't tell rags from laces!

"My delicate flounces are deftly made,
And I don't wish to renew them,
But if you wish your buttons sewed on,
Why, find some other to do them!"

Years have passed since this offer was made
Under the apple-tree shady;
But he is a Bachelor's Button still,
And she is a Ragged Lady!

CHIPS, THE CARPENTER.

BY JOHN BOYLE O'REILLY.

"Chips," whom I knew for months by no other name, was ship's carpenter of the whaler Gazelle, of New Bedford. He was twenty-six years old, six feet high, and strong as a tree. He was the favorite of the ship—and no wonder. He was tender and gentle, perhaps because he was strong; he was peaceful, because he was powerful. And the soft word which turneth away wrath, with the gentle hand to soothe a sufferer, are often needed in the whale fisheries.

Most of the foremast hands of the Gazelle were rough Portugese lads, from the Western Islands, on their first voyage. They were treated with coarse contempt by the few American seamen and by the officers.

The only "white man"—as the Yankee sailor loves to call himself—who was kind and patient with the rude boys was Chips; and he was never tired of showing them or teaching them something of what he knew. He was one of those unselfish fellows who did not believe in keeping knowledge to themselves. He had never been to sea before, but during the first two years of this voyage he had attended to so many things besides his own easy work, that he was considered as one of the best and coolest whalesmen aboard.

Although exempt from standing watch, he had insisted on doing the duty from the first day out. At night, if the weather were good, he would sit on the main hatch, in the center of a ring of the Portugese lads, and with wonderful patience teach them to make splices and knots, and to speak English. He never tired of doing this or any other kindly thing for them. In the day time, if there were work for him at his trade, he still had them around him, explaining everything as he sawed or planed, as if he wished to make them as good carpenters as he was himself.

On Sunday, when every one brought his letters and pictures on deck, Chips showed the only signs of sadness we ever saw. He was the only one on board—except myself—who had neither pictures nor letters—neither face nor word to remind him of home.

When the ship touched at some port with a postoffice, and every one ran for letters, Chips remained aboard—he knew there was none for him. In one of the boys' albums he found a picture of an old, white-haired woman—the lad's mother—and every Sunday afternoon he asked for that album, and always gave it back when he had turned and looked at that picture.

The ship had been two years out when I first saw Chips. Through strange and unhappy circumstances I was afloat on the Indian Ocean, in a small boat, when this New Bedford whaler hove in sight, and ran toward me. The first man to spring out in the mizzen chains, to help me aboard, was strong-handed Chips, with tears of sympathy in his eyes. On deck the captain met me with open hand and heart, and for eight months I sailed with the whalemen, and took part in the good and ill that befell them.

Chips and I were friends from the instant our hands struck. Shaking hands is one of the best tests of character. Some people shake your hand so politely that you feel they would care mighty little about shaking your acquaintance; some men slip their hands into yours and make you feel as if you were squeezing a fish; some people's hands are so thick, and fat, and cold, that you might as well grasp the fingers of a leather dummy. Most people, and nice people, shake hands as a preliminary to conversation; but now and then one's hand strikes into a sympathetic palm, the fingers take full hold, the thumbs interlock and close—and when that friendly grasp is over, there is not a word to be said—it spoke all friendly greeting in its own good language. Just such a kindly and grim grip did Chips give me the first time we met.

When I boarded the whaler I was in a bad way for clothes; all that belonged to me in the world were the few branded rags that I had worn in the boat. Sailors are used to such things; and they know the remedy. Every one came forward with his little offering. One brought a hat, another a jacket, another a pair of sea boots, a jack-knife, a cake of tobacco, and so on, until I had a bunk full of marine necessities.

Chips had least to give of all, for he had shipped without a regular outfit. But when he saw all that had been given, smiling at the rough boys as each one handed his offering, he drew me off to his own cubby-hole, and hauled round his own chest. Out on his bed came the contents; and in a minute there was a fair division of all it contained—flannels, shirts, stockings and everything to a handkerch'ef.

"These are yours, and these are mine," said Chips; "and I'll make you a chest to-morrow."

That's the sort of a man he was in everything. No wonder the boys loved him, and that the one word spoken in the best tones of the ship was the name of the kind-hearted, manly Chips.

He was as brave as he was kind. When whales were chased, Chips went down in a boat, and there was no cooler head among them when the fragile shell was to be laid broadside to a monster nearly as long as the ship. Once when the boat was stove in by a sweep of the awful flukes in the death-flurry, one of the boys was crushed by the blow and driven senseless under the water. When Chips came to the surface he counted the heads and missed one, and down in the bloody brine he went among the sharks and fished up the sinking body. He was a mighty swimmer, and, with only an oar to cling to, he held the senseless man out of water from noon till sunset.

But, to the story. The Gazelle had been cruising for three months a few hundred miles off the coast of Western Australia—the great penal colony of England—and during that time had not fallen in with a single sperm whale.

One raw afternoon, with a harsh breeze and a rising sea, at last we heard the long sing-song cry, from the masthead, "He blows! ther—re—blo-o-ws!" Four times, at regular intervals of about forty seconds, the cry was repeated; and then he knew it was a sperm whale.

It was about 5 o'clock in the evening when the first cry was heard, and the sun went down at 6:30, with scarcely five minutes of twilight. As a rule, on board of American whalers, when whales are seen late in the evening, the boats are not sent down, unless circumstances, such as weather, moonlight, and so on, are very favorable. In most cases the course of the whales and the speed of their travel are carefully noted. When "on a course" a school of sperm whales will move at the rate of about six miles an hour; when "feeding" they keep on the same "ground" not moving more than a few miles a day. When seen late in the evening, the ship is steered during the night according to the observations, and often finds the school in sight in the morning, when the boats are at once sent down.

This course was not followed on the evening in question. It was not a school we saw, but a "lone whale," and one of extraordinary size. The night promised to be a rough one, and the whale's motions were strangely irregular, as if he had lost himself in an unknown sea.

There is something solemn and mysterious in the sight of "lone whales," and marvelous superstitions are current among whalemen respecting them. Though spending year after year on the great waters, whalers become more impressionable to supernatural things than other seamen, and long observation of the shoals or schools of the vast creatures they pursue, tends to fill them with amazement and awe when they meet with a solitary leviathan who has abandoned all fellowship with his kind, who lives by his own law—lonely, mighty and terrible.

Soon after the cry from aloft, we saw the whale from the deck, only a short distance from the ship, and we might have seen him long before had not his white, bush-like spout been lost in the angry whiteness that was fast spreading over the sea.

For a moment all eyes were fastened on the long body, like a great, black tube, over which the waves washed. Every face was wonder-stricken at the immense size of the whale.

Captain Clifford had been examining him through a glass, which he handed in turn to each of his officers.

"What do you say, Mr. Hussey?" he inquired of the first mate, who glanced at the sun and answered:

"Go down, sir; we can do it."

"Mr. Joseph?" and the captain turned to the second mate, an old Portugese of extraordinary size, and perhaps the most famous whaleman alive.

"Go down, sir, if we want to get the fellow; we'll never see him again."

The two other officers were younger men, and of the same mind. There was no time lost in further consultation.

"Swing the boats!" shouted the "old man."

The lines and irons had already been thrown in by the crews. A "heave, oh!" and a straining sound, and in one minute the four boats struck the water, and the men were settled on the thwarts with the long oars out.

The sun was low and large and red, and the whole western sea and sky were magnificent in crimson and gold and black. The picture was one of the finest I ever saw. The rising sea was jet black, except where it was bloody; a broad road of crimson shimmered from the ship to the sun; the long body of the whale, even blacker than the sea, was plainly seen in the ruddy glare; and life was added to the immense scene by the four white specks—the whaleboats—closing to a point as they drew near the motionless monster.

It was not until the boats had left the ship that we realized how threatening was the weather. Every moment the seas came wilder and heavier against the vessel. Only now and again, as they were lifted on a sea, could we catch sight of the brave little boats. The breeze grew stronger every minute, and before the first boat neared the whale, was whistling through the rigging in the wild way that tells of a coming gale. The captain regretted the lowering of the boats, and soon signaled them to return. But the men were excited, and refused to see the signal. Filled to the gunwale, the seas lashing over them every moment, on they went where only a thing so nearly perfect as a whaleboat could keep afloat. As the first boat swung round to run down to leeward of the whale, the red sun stood fairly on the black field of ocean.

Talk about the bravery of soldiers in battle, or of men ashore in any enterprise you please; what is it to the bravery of such a deed as this? A thousand miles from land, six men in a little twenty-eight-foot shell, coolly going down in a stormy sea to do battle with the mightiest created animal! It is the extreme of human coolness and courage, because it is the extreme of danger. The soldier faces one peril—the bullet. The whaleman, in such a case as this, has three mighty enemies to fight—the sea, the gale and the whale.

We saw the harpooner of each boat stand up as they came within heaving distance, and send in his two irons. All the boats were fast before the monster seemed to feel the first blow. Then came the fight, the cruel and unnatural fight between vast power and keen skill. The black water was churned white as the flukes struck out in rage and agony. The sun disappeared and the gale screamed wilder in the rigging. We could no longer see the boats from the ship. The few men on board clewed up the light sail and took a reef in the top-sails, and by this time the night was dark as pitch, and the gale had whipped and bowled itself into a hurricane.

It was fearful to think of the four small boats out in such a sea as was then running. We on the ship had to cling to the rail of the rigging; the terrific strength of the waves swept the heavy vessel about like a cork. I saw the captain's face a moment as he passed the binnacle lamps, and it was absolutely deformed with grief and terror—not for himself, brave old sailor, but for his boys in the boats.

"Who's at the wheel?" he shouted; "send a steady man to the wheel."

"Ay, ay, sir!" answered in the dark a deep quiet voice; "I've got the wheel."

That was Chips, and I walked aft to be near him. Just then a long hail came through the darkness, and we saw the flash of a boat's lantern on the lee quarter. In a minute more a line was flung aboard, and we soon had one crew safe on deck. It was the mate's boat.

"Fast to the whale," was the answer, "and there are no lanterns on the boat."

One of the men from the boat relieved Chips at the wheel, and he went forward to rig lanterns at the fore and main tops. When this was done we stood together on the forecastle, looking and listening for the boats. Suddenly he turned to me and said:

"We're going to lose some one to-night. While I was at the wheel, it seemed to me as if something whispered in my ear that we're going to lose one man to-night."

I said he was growing as superstitious as old Kanaka Joe, and he answered:

"I can't help it. It did seem that I heard that whisper, and so plain was it that I nearly dropped the wheel in terror."

Another shout from the sea cut off further talk, and we soon had two more boats at the davits. The absent] one was Mr. Joseph's, and we knew that through thick and thin he would hold on to the whale. It was hours before we found him; and when we did he refused to cut his line from the carcass. The captain cried to him that we could not hold the whale in such a sea, but the whaleman cried back:

'He's a hundred-an'-fifty barreler; and if you don't take the line aboard, we'll stick to him in the boat!"

Soon after, as the gale was moderating, the line was taken in, passing through a strong iron brace screwed on to the starboard rail just forward of the gangway amidships, from which it was taken back and made fast to the windlass bits at the foot of the mainmast.

It was a new line of stout Manila hemp, and its strength was put to a fearful test. A hundred fathoms astern of the ship it held the monster's carcass; and, as the vessel rolled heavily to the sea the strain on the line was terrific. Standing forward of it I laid my hand on the line as the strain came, and I felt it stretch and contract like a rope of India rubber.

Mr. Joseph's boat had come alongside, and the captain, standing on the starboard rail, was shouting to him through a trumpet. The line from the whale passing from astern to the brace forward, and back to the bits amidships, made an acute angle, inside of which the captain was standing. I saw and noticed this as passed forward, and I noticed, also, in the dark, a tall man who seemed to be leaning against the line. "I hope he is forfard of it," I said to myself as I went on with what I was about.

I had not taken six steps from the spot when something strange occurred. The ship steadied, as if the wind had ceased. There was no sound greater than the storm; but, instead, there seemed to fall suddenly a stillness. I ran amidships and grasped for the line in the dark. It was gone! A rush to the rail, and all was clear. The strain had torn out the brace. The mighty pull of the whale astern had jerked the line straight, like the cord of a gigantic bow, and the captain, who had been standing on the rail, was struck by the flying rope and thrown senseless far into the sea.

All this had been seen by the men in the boat before any one on board had realized the affair. In less than a minute the cry of "Saved!" reached us from Mr. Joseph, and, in a shorter time than can be imagined by a landsman, the boat was hanging at the davits, and the injured commander was being cared for in his cabin.

Rum and hard rubbing are the potent remedies on a whaler, and by dint of these the captain opened his eyes in a quarter of an hour. He had been stunned, but not seriously injured.

He was amazed at first at seeing the mate and myself standing over him with the rum bottle. But without a word he realized the situation.

"How is the weather?" he asked.

"The wind has gone down," said Mr. Joseph. "We're under foresail jib and reefed topsails, and running right away from the whale."

"Gone?" said the old man.

"Gone," answered Mr. Joseph ruefully. "Stanchion dragged, and the line parted, and eight thousand dollars went without an owner."

"Tell Chips to see to that broken rail," said the captain, closing his eyes drowsily.

"Ay, ay, sir," said the old second mate, as he stamped on deck.

I heard him stop at the after-hatch, where the boat-steerers and the carpenter lived, and call "Chips" two or three times. At last there was an answer in another voice—not Chips'; then a round of hurried feet on deck, a shout down the forcastle; and a shout back in answer. There was no Chips there.

Two minutes after, a heavy foot came aft to the cabin stairs, and Mr. Joseph, with a white face, entered.

I knew what he had to tell. I knew now—just as if I had seen it all—who the tall man was whom I had seen leaning against the line.

The captain looked at the second mate.

"Chips is gone, sir," said the old sailor, with a tremor in his rough voice; "Chips was knocked over by the line, and we've gone four knots since it parted. I've put her about, and we're running down again."

There was dead silence. We all knew the search was hopeless. No man could swim in such a sea; and we had a thought, though no one spoke it, that brave Chips had been killed by the line before he touched the water.

All night we beat about the place where we thought it had occurred. The wind and sea fell, and the moon came out in great beauty to help our sad search. Every man on board staid on deck till the sun rose, and then we looked far and vainly over the heedless swell of the sea.

Chips was dead. The rough Portugese lads found it hard to believe that the kind heart and strong hand of their friend had gone forever. We all knew that the best man in the ship was taken away.

Two years afterward, when I found myself in Boston, I took from my sacred things a letter, which I had found in Chip's chest. It was addressed to a woman, with the name and number of a Cambridge street. I found the place—a small frame house, with lots of Chip's handiwork around it. His mother met me at the door, white-haired woman. See seemed to have been waiting and watching for somebody. A few words told the hopeless story. The letter was for her, and she read it over—the letter of her only boy, asking forgiveness for his one great and only disobedience—and as she read, the white head bent lower and lower, till it met the thin hands; and I turned and left the little room I had darkened, with all its poor ornaments, useless now, and, as I walked toward Boston, I could not help thinking that God's ways are often wofully far from being our ways.—Appleton's Journal.

The diet of the consumptive should be simple and nutritious; very strict rules as to special articles of diet are uncalled for, unless the stomach should have exhibited unusual signs of imperfect power. Meat should be taken once or twice a day, with a good allowance of fat. Fish is nutritious, especially oysters. Milk is very nutritious, and two or three pints may be taken in the course of the day. At the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton many of the patients have a glass of rum and milk the first thing in the morning, before breakfast, to help them to dress, and undoubtedly it often does good. Asses' milk may be taken when ordinary milk disagrees. Another favorite prescription is fat bacon for breakfast. Sugar is very fattening, and there is no objection to taking it even in considerable quantities. A moderate allowance of wine or spirits is advisable, but it should be taken with caution when it flushes the face or quickens the pulse. Moderate and frequent exercise in the open air is essential. We do know that now and again it is very essential to "change the air;" but we consider that to do that with any chance of advantage it is necessary to go far afield; and we think also that such change of the air is only needful when sickness of the body has come upon us, or when it threatens to come. When nothing else can be done, sitting out in the open air should always be insisted on—in a garden, on a balcony, or even at an open window. Anything is better than remaining shut up in the same room from morning to night. We heard of a man who, on being told that riding was beneficial, hired a horse and galloped about till he was so exhausted that he did not recover for a fortnight. Exercise should be carried to a point short of producing fatigue. In ordinary cases of consumption there is not the slightest occasion for the patient to keep his room, but still it is very important that the sleeping apartment should be properly ventilated. The great thing is to get as much pure air as possible consistent with warmth and the absence of draughts. Only a moderate temperature should be permitted, so that when in bed the patient does not feel cold. In summer, good ventilation should be secured by letting down the windows for an inch or so at the top. At the Hospital for Consumption at Brompton the wards and galleries are kept, winter and summer, at a uniform temperature of a little over 60 deg. The policy of this system is open to question, and, in the opinion of many competent judges, the patients would do better if the temperature were considerably reduced.—Family Physician.

The Terrors of Carving.

The misery of habitual carving can hardly be exaggerated. The man who comes home tired from his day's work and sits down to dinner needs a quiet and easy meal. Instead of having this, he is compelled to undergo the labor of carving, and to postpone his personal dinner until his appetite has vanished. It is no small labor to carve for a family, say of six persons. The joints of the spring chicken are apparently made of a combination of steel and India rubber, and can neither be cut nor dragged apart; while the roast beef, toughened by long years of service in its original shape of an ox, requires more strength of wrist on the part of the carver than would suffice to saw a twelve-inch log. When at last the work of carving is done, the delicate and difficult duty of "helping" begins. There can be no peace of mind for the man who helps his family and his occasional guests to any food except soup or oysters, both of which can be accurately and fairly divided. In the case of children he can never give satisfaction. There is no rule in this matter beyond that of giving the chicken legs to the boys, which can be followed. To ask people what part of the chicken they prefer is simply madness. Either everybody will tell the truth and demand the best cut, in which case all but one will be exasperated by failing to have their wishes gratified, or everbody will reply "Any part," "It makes no difference," or words to the same mendacious and aggravating effect. Of course, when the man who says "It makes no difference" is helped to anything but the breast, he becomes the enemy of the carver for life, and nothing can disabuse him of the impression that he has been wantonly insulted. It is far better to boldly help people without making any pretense of consulting their wishes. They will then regard the carver as a rude and careless host; but they will acquit him of any intention to press open insults on his guests.—New York Times.

Chicago Lumber Trade.

In the attempt to give an idea of the extent of the Chicago lumber trade at the present time figures delude and dissatisfy. It is easy to say that the city handled, in 1852, 148,000,000 feet; in 1872, 1,184,000,000 feet; in 1879, 1,500,000,000 feet—the last figures representing nearly one-third of the entire manufacture of the Northwest; but "millions" convey no startling idea to the layman's mind. It may help a little, however, to mention that to bring this lumber into the city would require average arrivals of thirty cargoes per day for 200 days, each containing a quarter of a million feet; or that if a number of canal-boats, each containing one-eighth of a million feet, were loaded with the importation of 1879, and placed in line in the Erie canal, they would reach, touching end for end, from Albany to Rochester—300 miles.—A. A. Hayes, Jr., in Harper's Magazine.

"A Most Respectable Jury."

The law provides for an ideal jury, that is, one which is not prejudiced for or against the prisoner. But in practice it is difficult to secure twelve men of "cold neutrality." All men are more or less influenced by unconscious prejudices, such as arise from birth, education, social position, or habits of life.

Lawyers know the power which sympathy has over the judgment of men. In defending criminals, they not infrequently finesse to secure a jury whose unconscious sympathies will be in favor of the prisoner. A thief's counsel would not be grieved if he believed Shakspeare's words true of those trying his client:

> The jury, passing on the prisoner's life,
> May in the sworn twelve have a thief or two > Guiltier than him they try.

An anecdote of a distinguished lawyer of Kentucky, the late John J. Crittenden, sets forth this trick of advocacy. He had been retained to defend a man indicted for biting off another man's ear in a fight. The trial came off before Judge Broadnax, a stately, high-toned gentleman, who dressed in short trousers, silk stockings and top-boots. The Judge hated rowdyism, and, though a warm admirer of Mr. Crittenden, often chided him for taking fees of low rascals who habitually engaged in brawls.

After much sparring between the court and State's Attorney and the prisoner's counsel, eleven jurymen were obtained. Many respectable men had been rejected by Mr. Crittenden, a fact which had exasperated the Judge. An ill-looking fellow, with a tattered straw hat, a piece of his nose torn off, and a bruised face, was brought up to be sworn in as the twelfth juryman.

Mr. Crittenden asked him a few questions, and then coolly said:

"Well, Judge, rather than be the cause of any more delay, I'll take this man."

"I knew it!" exclaimed the angry Judge, springing to his feet. "Yes, I knew it! The moment I laid eyes on the fellow, I knew you would accept him! Did any living man," he continued, looking contemptuously at the jury-box, "ever see such a jury before?"

"Why, your Honor," quietly replied Mr. Crittenden, "I pronounce this a most respectable jury."

Of course, after the Judge's speech, the prisoner's case was decided. The jury went through the formality of a trial, and brought in a verdict—"Not guilty." Their prejudices and their irritation, excited by the Judge's contempt, were too active for them to render a verdict according to law and evidence.

Quietly Caught.

Parisian justice, once on the track of a criminal, is almost as inevitable as fate. A letter from the French capital illustrates the ingenious perfection of the detective system in that city. No rogue, French or foreign, can know but that an officer is concealed under the coat of the first servant who waits on him.

A young man, dressed in the height of fashion, came with all the other travelers out of the train which had just reached Paris from Brussels. He had scarcely quitted the car when he was accosted courteously:

"Do you wish a porter, sir?"

"The very thing I was looking for. Will you take this valise, and show me the way to Hotel de la Roumania, Boulevard St. Michel? As this is my first visit to Paris, I prefer going there on foot."

"At your service, sir."

On they trudged. When they had crossed Pont St. Michel, the porter, instead of the following du Palais, turned to the left, went down Quai de l'Horloge, and entered the Prefecture of Police.

He said to the owner of the valise, "I am going to introduce you to the master of the house," as he ushered him into the office of the head detective.

The latter no sooner laid eyes on the stranger than he said, "Why, good-day, Mons. Vanwater. You have just come from Antwerp, where you stole a large sum of money. You have already spent five years in jail for a similar crime. What on earth possessed you to want to put up at the Hotel de la Roumania, where lodgings are dear, when you knew I had a chamber at your disposal for which I should not charge 1 cent?"

The thief was put in a cell until the legal papers to warrant his extradition reached Paris. It is well said, "The law has a long arm."

Knowledge in Old Times.

Some of the early nations attained a knowledge of science and skill in art which were lost in the subsequent ages. Wendell Phillips' famous lecture on "The Lost Arts" ought to make us modest, and less inclined to boast of our own superiority.

In a recent lecture before the Geographical Society, Judge Daly paid a tribute to the knowledge of the old Babylonians. They were well acquainted with the heavens, catalogued the stars, and named the constellations. They traced the sun's course through the twelve signs of the zodiac, and divided time into weeks, months and years.

They speculated on the connection of the weather with the changes of the heavenly bodies, and thought the phases of the moon had a subtle influence. They noted the spots on the sun, and seemed to have possessed telescopes, as Layard found a crystal lens among the ruins of Nineveh. It is interesting to know that they had a seventh day of rest, corresponding to our Sabbath, and enacted rigorous rules for keeping it.—Exchange.

BURIAL OF A CHINAMAN.

How the Devil Was Kept at a Distance While the Soul's Dinner Was Eaten.

While the gatekeeper at the railroad crossing near the entrance to the Evergreens Cemetery, Brooklyn, was quietly reading the day's news, says the New York Sun, a funeral procession dashed past at a rate that made him spring to his feet, drop his paper, and open his eyes to their widest. The string of carriages were following a handsome hearse, through the glass sides of which a costly casket was seen. The coffin held the body of the late Lee Wan, a Mott street grocer.

On the hearse, beside the driver, sat a pale, gaunt Chinaman in a gown of white silk, with a strip of white linen tied around his arm and a white porcelain bracelet on his wrist, who at intervals of every 200 or 300 feet scattered a half-dozen slips of blank paper in the road, in order, it was afterward explained, that the devil, who is believed to pursue the dead, might be detained by his curiosity to examine these papers, until the deceased man could be put under ground out of his reach. The dozen carriages following the hearse were occupied by Chinamen.

The coffin having been removed, not by friends of the deceased man, but by two or three drivers, it was lowered by a couple of grave-diggers. The Chinamen, to the number of about fifty, drew near and threw earth upon the coffin. Then they gathered in groups to talk in their peculiar sing-song fashion, while a half dozen of their number unloaded from a basket the dead man's clothing, several red candles, a large bunch of slow matches, and a box containing victuals. The clothing was rolled into a bundle and burned. The candles and slow matches were set firmly in the earth at the foot of the grave and lighted. The box was then opened, and three bowls of rice, a broiled chicken, and a plate of lean meat, produced therefrom, were placed beside the freshly-heaped mound, that the disembodied soul might feed upon them preparatory to taking its flight. The chop-sticks were not seen to move, nor was there any perceptible diminution in the quantity of the viands, yet the Chinamen seemed to firmly believe that the spirit of Lee Wan passed that way and partook of the banquet. The tramps in the neighborhood, who had been attracted by the oddity of the procession, eyed the dishes in a way that caused an aged, opium-smoking Chinaman to arouse himself from his dreamy condition, and, ere the procession went back at the same swift pace at which it came, to thrust the soul's dinner into the tea box, and make off with it.

After a mat had been spread beside the grave the mourners went up in twos and threes, and, standing or kneeling on this mat, saluted Lee Wan for the last time. The salute consisted of raising and dropping the clasped hands three times, accompanying each movement with a nod of the head, then dropping on all fours and ducking the head three times more, the face almost touching the earth. Each person, after finishing his salute, emptied upon the ground a tiny cup of weak tea that had been poured from a blue-and-white pot, of design calculated to craze a bric-a-brac hunter.

An intelligent-looking Chinaman, with the face of a Tartar, but the clothes of an American citizen, said that the candles and matches were burned for the same reason that Christians sprinkled holy water on graves—"to keep the devil off." Where priests were available it was customary to employ them to recite prayers over the graves; but there are no priests in New York, he said, and therefore the burial devolved entirely upon the friends of the dead man.

After the saluting was over, cigars were distributed among the Chinamen, and they re-entered their carriages. The place was deserted a few minutes later, and nothing but the fragrant blue smoke of the slow matches, rising in the hot air, and a small boy loitering near to steal the candles indicated that a heathen burial had taken place.

Bible Revision.

Concerning the revision of the Bible the Christian Union says: "The work is rapidly drawing to a close. We may expect the issue at the end of this year or the beginning of the next. The New Testament will be published by itself. The Old Testament cannot, properly, be issued before 1883, owing to its greater bulk. If we should indulge in predictions we should likely say that prejudiced minds will object to many changes that will be found, because some familiar phrases, like 'He who now letteth will let,' will (we doubt not) be rubbed out, and something better inserted. But thoughtful persons, and those who desire the meaning of the Greek original, cannot but be pleased with a translation in which forty-one Greek scholars of all Christian creeds are agreed. We are not afraid that in style any more than in translation these forty-one men will go astray and shock the Protestant world. These men know what is good English, and what is dignified English. They love the old English Bible as much as Bishop Coxe does, and they will see that it is not roughly treated. Our advice, then, is to keep quiet till the revised version appears, and then let us examine it, not in the light of our prejudices, but in the light of a scholarly common sense. All attempts now to say what it is, or to assail it, are premature. Our own writing is merely to show that we have reason to expect the best."

Scripture Practically Applied.

Many years ago, when the mowing on the farm was done with a scythe, Farmer A. and his hired man were mowing together in the field. The hired man was ahead when he discovered that he was in close proximity to a large nest of hornets. He advanced as far as he thought was prudent, and jumped from his swath and ran away. Farmer A., imagining that the hired man was frightened at nothing, stepped into his swath with this scriptural quotation: "The wicked flee when no man pursueth, but the righteous are bold as a lion," and moved ahead. Two or three strokes brought him in contact with the nest, and the hornets swarmed out at a lively rate, giving him a sharp reception. The farmer ran, when it was the hired man's turn to quote scripture, which he did by the following: "The wise man oreseeth the evil and turneth aside, but the fool passeth on and is punished."

The Natural Orator.

"The orator is born, not made," say certain critics. The assertion is contradicted by so many exceptions that it cannot be received as a general rule. It is, however, verified in the career of some great orators. The most notable case, in the annals of American orators, is that of Patrick Henry. The bees of Hymettus touched his lips, as they did those of Plato, while slumbering in his cradle. He lisped in eloquence, as Pope did in numbers.

Henry was a natural orator, but he was "only that and nothing more." Mr. Jefferson, who knew him well, and often listened spell-bound to his eloquence, says he was neither a man of education nor a well-read lawyer.

Wirt, in his "Life of Henry," which should more properly be entitled Wirt's "Romance," says he read "Plutarch's Lives" once a year. "I don't believe," said Mr. Jefferson, "he ever read two volumes of them."

One November, on leaving Jefferson's house, Henry selected two books from his host's library. "I will take these two volumes of 'Hume's Essays,'" he remarked, as he put them in his saddle-bags, "and try to read them this winter." In the spring he returned them, saying he had not been able to get half through one of them.

In fact, Henry was too lazy and too fond of company to read. His delight was to pass weeks hunting in the "piny woods" along with overseers and people of similar social position. At night, when they gathered about the camp fire, Henry was the soul of the company—telling stories and cracking jokes until bed-time.

Yet the lazy, half-educated lawyer seemed like one inspired when he stood before a jury or on the stump.

"He appeared to me," wrote Mr. Jefferson, "to speak as Homer wrote. I never heard," he continues, "anything that deserved to be called by the same name with what flowed from him. Where he got that torrent of language from is inconceivable. I have frequently shut my eyes while he spoke, and when he was done asked myself what he had said, without being able to recollect a word of it. He was no logician."

But Henry's case is an exceptional one. There is nothing like it in our history, and the times were on his side. To-day the man who wishes to attain eminence as an orator must have ideas and know how to put them in an attractive form. To gain ideas and acquire the art of putting them, he must study.—Youth's Companion.

Marrying for Money.

There never was a time when heiresses were in so great a demand, or when worldly mammas smiled more approvingly on the attentions of prosperous young men to their daughters. This fact has been very plainly shown at all the watering places this summer. In truth, the demand is so active and so manifest that what supply there is grows shy, and wealth is tending to ally itself with wealth, both to strengthen its position and to escape merely mercenary importunities. Where there is money on both sides, it is felt that matrimony is safer; and perhaps it is. Young men who are on the hunt for heiresses do not deserve to be encouraged; and young women who put a money price on their affections may well be left among the unsold goods.

An Unpleasant Youthful Recollection.

From early youth I had been a sufferer with severe headache, writes C. W. Eck, Esq., proprietor of the St. Louis, Mo., St. Louis Co. Waechter. Many remedies, by by the use of which I endeavored to obtain relief, proved ineffectual. At last some friends recommended the Hamburg Drops to me; and since I used them I feel better than ever and no sign of the old headache has appeared again.

"No; de better way am to git your eye fixed on something, an' den keep movin', keep movin'. De whole philosophy of life is in de little words, 'Keep gittin',' and after awhile you are sho' to fin' yourself somewhar."

A Mystery Explained.

On Sunday evening says the Rochester Herald, the residents in the southern suburbs were startled by a heavy roar as of distant thunder, accompanied by a trembling of the earth. This lasted but a few seconds, and the general opinion was that a slight earthquake had taken place. Telephonic dispatches received from Richmond Mills last evening explains the mystery in another way. It appears that a well known society young man was showing some young ladies at the mills how to swing in a hammock. The lesson proceeded successfully until the fastening broke, and the young man aforesaid struck the ground in the shape of the letter V. The roaring was caused by his remarks, and the trembling of the earth by the sudden contact of something less than three hundred pounds of humanity.

Vegetine.

More to Me than Gold.

WALPOLE, Mass., March 3, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:

I wish to inform you what VEGETINE has done for me. I have been troubled with Erysipelas Humor for more than thirty years, in my limbs and other parts of my body, and have been a great sufferer. I commenced taking VEGETINE one year ago last August, and can truly say it has done more for me than any other medicine. I seem to be perfectly free from this humor and can recommend it to every one. Would not be without this medicine—'tis more to me than gold—and I feel it will prove a blessing to others as it has to me.

Yours, most respectfully, MRS. DAVID CLARK.

It has done more good than all Medical Treatment.

NEWMARKET, Ont., Feb. 8, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS, Boston, Mass.:

Sir—I have sold during the past year a considerable quantity of your VEGETINE, and I believe in all cases it has given satisfaction. In one case, a delicate young lady of about seventeen years was much benefited by its use. Her parents informed me that it had done her more good than all the medical treatment to which she had previously been subjected.

Yours respectfully, J. BENTLEY, M. D.

Loudly in Its Praise.

TORONTO, Ont., March 3, 1880.

Dear Sir—Considering the short time that VEGETINE has been before the public here, it sells well as a blood purifier, and for troubles arising from a sluggish or torpid liver it is a first-class medicine. Our customers speak loudly in its praise.

SORE EARS, CATARRH. Many people are afflicted with these loathsome diseases, but very few ever get well from them; this is owing to improper treatment only, as they are readily curable if properly treated. This is no idle boast, but a fact I have proven over and over again by my treatment. Send for my little Book, free to all; it will tell you all about these matters and who I am. My large Book, 375 pages, octavo; price, $2, by mail. Address DR. C. E. SHOEMAKER, Aural Surgeon, Reading, Pa.

His Reasoning Powers.

A couple of old darkies met and began talking over matters and things.

"How is ole Col. Jones comin' on, what used to own you before de war? He is so old he must be gettin' to be childish and losin' his reasoning powers."

"Don't know nuffin' about him—haint seed him since befoah last Christmas."

"Why, what's de matter?"

"Ain't got no use for such ole gemmans. Last time I was dar I fotched him a big redfish I had cotched. I tole him ef he would gimme a table-knife I would scrape an' clean de fish. What do you s'pose he said?"

"Asked yer to come in and get a dram, and chat awhile about ole times on de ole plantation."

"No, sah; he tole me ef I couldn't borry a table-knife from some of de naburs dat he would radder clean de fish himself. I s'pose he was afeard I'd be keerless in handin' de knife back when I got done wid it."

The other darky rubbed his chin and remarked:

A Wily Poodle.

A blind beggar was in the habit of frequenting the Pont des Sts. Peres, France, where he used to station himself with a clarinet and a very intelligent poodle. Contributions poured freely into the little wooden bowl which the dog held in his mouth. One day the blind man, who had reached an advanced age, was not to be seen. He had fallen ill. His companion, however, continued to frequent the accustomed spot, and the passers-by, to whom he was familiar, understood that his master was unwell, and, touched by his fidelity, dropped their pence into his bowl in increased numbers. The beggar went the way of all flesh, an event which the wily poodle carefully kept to himself, until he also became an absentee from the Pont des Sts. Peres. The poor animal was found lying dead in a cellar near his former master's abode, a sum of 20,000 francs in bonds of the Orleans railway being discovered under the litter on which he was stretched.

DeKalb County Teachers' Institute.

The annual meeting of the teachers of DeKalb county for the purpose of comparing methods and learning how to teach better, is appointed for Monday, Oct. 18th, in the high school at the town of Butler.

An unusually pleasant and profitable session is expected. There is an excellent spirit among our teachers, they have been doing good work, and hope to improve upon it.

To encourage attendance a credit of ten is given at the roll call, morning and afternoon. Full attendance secures one hundred, this is given to applicants for license at examinations held during the year. An examination will be held on Saturday at the close of the institute. As will be seen from the programme, instructors of acknowledged merit have been secured. The intention is to improve the time and to gain knowledge. To this end, all who can and will help, are invited to do so. Each evening of the first four days is given to a lecture or address. Same subjects will have the same hour on following days.

Where Sarah Was.

[Detroit Free Press.]

A Wayne county farmer had some wheat stolen a few nights since, and he was so sure that he knew who the thief was that he came into Detroit and secured a warrant for a certain young man living near him. When the case came up for trial in justice alley the defendant said he could prove an alibi. In order to do this he had brought in "his girl," a buxom lass of 22. She took the stand and swore that he sat up with her from 7 o'clock in the evening until broad daylight next morning.

"People can very easily be mistaken," observed the plaintiff's lawyer.

"I don't care—I know he was there," she replied.

"What did you talk about?"

"Love!" she promptly answered.

"What time did the old folks go to bed?"

"I gave 'em the wink about 10."

"Sure you was there at midnight, are you?"

"Yes, sir."

"Why are you sure?"

She blushed, looked over to her lover and laughed, and getting a nod to go ahead, she said:

"Well, sir, just as the clock struck 12 the old man jumped out of bed, up stairs, and hollered down: 'Sarah, yer ma wants some o' that catnip tea!' and we got such a start that we broke the back of the rocking-chair, and went over backwark kerplunk."

"Then the jury must understand that you were seated on Samuel's knee?"

"I object," put in Samuel's lawyer, and his honor remembered the days of his youth and sustained the objection.

Three Minutes and Eight Seconds Under Water.

Miss Ada LaSelle, the wonderful lady aquarial artist, concluded her engagement at Strawberry hill, by remaining the extraordinary time of three minutes and eight seconds, without breathing, underneath the water. The great difficulty of this dangerous feat can be more readily imagined when we take into consideration that the pressure on the body of the 800 gallons of water, contained in the tank in which she performs, is ten times greater than the air we breathe; and also that she is obliged to resist the tendency of her body to rise to the surface. And the water in which she performed is extremely cold. Had it not been for this latter drawback, Miss LaSelle has stated that she could have remained twenty-seconds longer. She leaves Boston in company with Captain Beach to open an eight weeks' engagement at the exposition, Louisville, Ky.

A Popular and Reliable Company.

As to the soundness and standing of the Ohio Farmers' Insurance Company, the Indiana Farmer has the following editorial in the issue of May 29, 1880:

"Some of the foreign insurance companies are waging a war on the Ohio Farmers' Fire Insurance Company in this state, and report all manner of things about it. We had occasion to examine its reports and papers on file in the office of the Auditor of State this week, as well as those of other companies, and we found its affairs were frankly and freely open to the world, and that its condition compares favorably with other companies. We examined them with a view of ascertaining how much truth there was in statements of other and interested companies, and we believe that the company is sound, and does business safely. The fact that for 32 years it has promptly paid all losses, and accumulated nearly a million of capital besides, is a bit of practical experience in its favor that cannot be whistled down at a breath. It seems that the cause of the war and jealously is, that this company has become very popular among the farmers of the west, and taking no city or conflagration risks, can and does issue policies for less than the rates of some other companies."

The principal office of the company above named is located at Le Roy, Medina county, Ohio. Mr. C. G. Shepard is the soliciting agent for DeKalb county, Indiana and Defiance county, Ohio. For full particulars concerning the company, address F. M. Thompson, general agent, Hicksville, O.24-tf

GARFIELD'S PURJURY—A CLEAR STATEMENT FROM JUDGE BLACK.

He Replies to Certain Interrogatories Submitted to him by The Sun.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE SUN.

Sir: Your questions are entitled to a candid answer. I will set down their substance and give my reply to each one in the order you put them:

1. Did I mean in my letter to Mr. Blaine that General Garfield acknowledged the receipt of stock and dividends from Oaks Ames?

Unquestionably he agreed to take the stock, and did receive dividends upon it. The letter plainly implies that he had not concealed, nor tried to conceal that fact from me. But his admission was coupled with a statement which showed him to be guiltless.

2. Did he declare to me that he would go before the Poland committee and testify truly that he had taken stock?

I had no previous conversation with him about his testimony before the Poland committee, and I did not know what it would be until I heard it delivered.

3. Did I advise and urge him to tell the truth?

No; certainly not. Such advice and urgency would have been a most outrageous insult, which I could not offer to any gentleman of his character.

4. Did he agree to adopt the line of defense adopted by me?

You seem to think that I was his counsel. I was not; but, as his friend and a believer in his perfect innocence, I was extremely anxious that he should get safely out of this unfortunate business. After it began to be discussed in the newspapers, and before the committee was appointed, I besought him to make no statement for the public eye which might be inconsistent with what he had said to me. Lest he might forget it, or miss the important points of it, I repeated the substance of it somewhat carefully. He did not reply, and I learned soon afterward that he had authorized a total and flat contradiction. Simultaneously, the other members of congress who were implicated made separate statements of the same kind, assuring the public that they had never taken or owned any of the stock, or received any dividends upon it.

'5'. Why, according to my understanding of the fact, did Garfield adopt a defense so contrary to that he had agreed on?

I have already said that he made no agreement about it. His reason for abandoning the true ground of his defense was, doubtless, the necessity he felt himself under of making common cause with his political friends, for whom there was no refuge except in a fundamental falsehood.

I am, with great respect, yours, etc.,

J. S. BLACK.

The Mysterious Rascal.

[Philadelphia Times.]

Senator Conkling is pulling to win, but who he is pulling for can't be figured out up to the present time.

Jessen's Figures.

[Chicago Times.]

Colonel Jessen, who has just returned from a stumping tour in Indiana, says the democrats will carry the state from 10,000 to 25,000 majority, with the chances in favor of the latter figure.

Let Jeems Explain.

[Chicago Times.]

Congressman Garfield has generally voted for subsidies in land and cash. Will President Garfield veto subsidy schemes? He should be heard from on this point.

Off for Indiana.

[Philadelphia Times.]

The boys, without distinction of party, are off for Indiana, expecting to get their work in there on Tuesday. If they should find their way into prison and so be missing from their own wards in November, there will be few tears shed in Philadelphia.

Davenport.

[New York Herald.]

Nearly a million dollars are said to have departed from republican pockets in the east and going to Indiana to save that state; republican election day tricks will go later, our informant says, and be in charge of a gentleman who will use them to the disadvantage of the democrats.

BANCROFT, THE HISTORIAN.

His Eightieth Birthday—In Favor of Hancock for President.

[From the New York Telegram [Ind.]

On Sunday, the venerable historian, George Bancroft, celebrated his eightieth birthday at his summer residence on Newport's romantic cliffs. The venerable gentleman believes that the tide has set in favor of General Hancock and that without doubt the democrats will be successful in the presidential campaign, he predicts a democratic victory in Indiana.

Political Economy.

(Boston Journal.)

"Bad luck to 'em!" exclaimed Patrick, extracting himself from the general assortment of pickaxes, wheelbarrows, coals and profanity with which the explosion of his lamp had associated him; "bad luck to 'em for calling that a 'safety lamp!' When I'd did but pry open that same for a whiff of the pipe, didn't it fly into ten thousand pieces and knock me down widout as much as saying 'look out for yourself, Pat!' That's the way they chate the poor laborin' man, bad 'cess to 'em."

A Perpetual Skating Pond.

(Yankee Fork (Cal.) Herald.)

There is a lake on the Saw Tooth mountains that has probably no equal in the United States. It is about sixty or sixty-five miles from Bonanza, and at an altitude of nearly twelve thousand feet. The lake lies in a basin among the sharp crags of the snowy Saw Tooth, and is a sheet of perpetual ice. It was discovered in August of last year by a party of prospectors, and named the Ice Lake. The sun seems to have no effect upon it except in places adjoining the shore. It is simply a great bowl in the hard mountain rock brimful of solid ice, upon which the rays of the sun descend with no power to penetrate.

Twenty-Eight Years Ago.

[Pittsburgh Post.]

Fred. Douglass, who holds the marshalship of the district from Hayes, on condition he will abandon its social duties at the White House, made a speech in Indiana the other night, denouncing George W. Julian as an "apostate and a traitor." We remember twenty eight years ago, in 1852, when it cost something to be a free-soiler or an abolitionist, Mr. Julian was nominated for vice-president by the free-soil national convention, in Pittsburgh, with John P. Hale for president. Charles Francis Adams was the most prominent delegate at the convention. He also is a supporter of Hancock, another of this pensioned darkey's "apostates and traitors.

Dead and Forgotten.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

It is related of Lord Palmerston that when asked for particular information concerning an important state question, he excused himself upon the grounds that the facts had never been made known but to two men—himself and another. Then, with a sigh, he continued: "The other man is dead, and I have forgotten." In regard to this DeGolyer business, and further, in fact, with regard to the whole candidacy of Mr. Garfield, the republican party seems to be in the lamentable predicament of which Lord Palmerston complained. The other party has been gathered to its grandmothers, and its own memory is treacherous.

How the State of New York Looks.

The New York Tribune estimates that New York City will give this year a total of about 190,000 as against 17[illegible],000 in 1876. In arranging the two proportions between the two parties the Tribune gives Hancock a majority of 60,000 in that city. Kings county, (Brooklyn), calculating on similar data, will according to the same journal, give Hancock a majority of 22,000. So the two cities will give Hancock 82,000 majority. That is what the republicans in the balance of the state will have to overcome to beat Hancock. Such is the Tribune's calculation.

New York City and Brooklyn in 1876 gave Tilden a majority over Hayes of 72,550. Hayes' majority in the rest of the state outside of those two cities was 40,783. That left Tilden a majority over Hayes of 32,828 throughout the whole state.

It will be seen that the republicans outside of New York City and Brooklyn will have to double the majority they gave Hayes in 1876 to equal Hancock's majority in New York City and Brooklyn. Who believes they can do it? Hancock, it is admitted on all sides, will poll proportionately as large a vote as Mr. Tilden outside of the two cities named. There are few who do not believe he will do even better than that. How, then, is it possible for Mr. Garfield to carry New York? We consider the state of New York as reliable for Hancock as the state of Kentucky, on the popular vote.

Good Manners.

It is a rule of manners to avoid exaggeration. A lady loses as soon as she admires too easily and too much. In man or woman, the face and the person lose power when they are on the strain to express admiration. A man makes his inferiors his superiors by heat. Why need you, who are not a gossip, talk as a gossip, and tell eagerly what the neighbors or the journals say? State your opinion without apology. The attitude is the main point. Assure your companions that, come good news or come bad, you remain in good heart and mind, which is the best news you can possibly communicate.

Self-control is the rule. You have in you there a noisy, sensual savage, which you are to keep down, and turn all his strength to beauty. For example, what a seneschal and detective is laughter! It seems to require several generations of education to train a squeaking or a shouting habit out of a man. Sometimes, when in almost all expressions the Choctaw and the slave have been worked out of him, a coarse nature still betrays itself in his contemptible squeak of joy. The great gain is not to shine, not to conquer your companion (then you learn nothing but conceit), but to find a companion who knows what you do not; to tilt with him and be overthrown, horse and foot, with utter destruction of all your logic and learning. There is a defeat that is useful. Then you can see the real and counterfeit, and you will never accept the counterfeit again. You will adopt the art of war that has defeated you. You will ride to battle horsed on the very logic which you found irresistible. You will accept the fertile truth instead of the solemn, customary lie.

When people come to see us we foolishly prattle, lest we be inhospitable, but things said for conversation are chalk eggs. Do not say things. What you are stands over you the while and thunders so that I cannot hear what you say to the contrary. A lady of my acquaintance said: "I do not care so much what they say as I do for what makes them say it." The law of the table is beauty—a respect to the common sort of all guests. Everything is unreasonable which is private to two or three, or any portion of the company Tact never violates for a moment this law; never intrudes the others of the house, the vices of the absent or a tariff of expenses or professional privacies; as we say, we never "talk shops" before company. Lovers abstain from caresses and haters from insults, whilst they sit in one parlor with common friends. Would we codify the laws that should reign in household, and whose daily transgression annoys and mortifies us, and degrade our household life, we must learn to adorn every day with sacrifices. Good maners are made up of petty sacrifices.

Voorhis, member of Congress from New Jersey, has been indicted for embezzlement....The heaviest casting ever attempted in the United States has just been made at the Black Diamond Steel Works in Pittsburgh. It was an anvil block weighing 160 tons. The preparations consumed several months of labor, and were of the most elaborate kind.

CHARLES NILTHEW, of Pottsville, Pa., shot his unfaithful wife and then killed himself....Two co[illegible] at Lowell—the Chase and the Faulkner—have been burned. Loss, $300,000.

AN express train on the Fitchburg railroad left the track near Littleton, Mass. Two passengers were killed and several injured....The firm of Moore & Jenkins, of New York, have made an assignment. The liabilities of the firm amount to $387,274, and the nominal assets to $234,908.

THE WEST.

EDWARD CROMWELL, while working in a field with Nathan Lambdin, by whom he was employed, in Orange county, Ind., had a chill followed by high fever, during which he shot Lambdin in the neck and shoulder, and stabbed him in the neck. He then ran hastily to the river near by and drowned himself. It is supposed he was delirious with fever....Prof. Mark W. Harrington, Director of the Observatory at the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor, reports having discovered a large comet. It is situated near the star Epsilon of the constellation Bootes, and has a tail nearly a degree long....The Minnesota wheat crop is much better than the farmers of that State thought it would be some weeks ago. Then the frequent heavy rains threatened to damage the crop. The Dakota crop is the finest ever raised.

MRS. GEORGE HAMILTON, of Sacramento, Cal., sent a note, asking an interview with her husband, from whom she had separated. He called on her, and during the conversation she shot him dead. Cause, jealousy. Last winter she shot and severely wounded a young girl who had excited her jealousy.

A SIX-HORSE coach containing Chief Justice Donohue, of New York, and several other tourists, capsized at Milton, Cal., while returning from the Yosemite. Father Trayner was fatally injured, but the other members of the party escaped with slight bruises.

THE rag-cutting rooms of the writing-paper mill at Elkhart, Ind., have been burned. Loss estimated at $35,000....A systematic robbery of the Kansas Pacific road, which has been going on for several months, has just been unearthed by detectives, and the principal conspirators, three conductors and a baggagemaster, arrested. Their scheme was to sell tickets over the Kansas Pacific road, cautioning purchasers to leave Denver on a certain train, thereby taking them through to Kansas City under the supervision of the three conductors engaged in the conspiracy.

THOMAS FORREST, who fatally stabbed Michael Co[illegible] for discharging him from employment at the California mine, at Silver Reef, Utah, was taken from jail by masked men and hanged.

THE SOUTH.

A STAGE which runs between Pearce City, Mo., and Eureka Springs, Ark., was stopped near twenty miles from the former place by a party of six masked, well-armed men, and the passengers, eleven men and one woman, robbed of their money and other valuables. About $[illegible] was taken. Most of the passengers threw away their pocket-books when the stage was stopped, but recovered them when the robbers left. A passenger attempted to draw a revolver, but a bullet from one of the robbers, which passed through his coat-sleeve, admonished him to keep quiet.

A BODY of armed men entered the town of Dalton, Ga., and rescued a lot of contraband goods seized by the revenue officers. The Washington department has telegraphed the Collector to use all his force and authority to capture and punish the raiders....The steamship [illegible] left Savannah, Ga., a few days ago, for Liverpool, taking 7,118 bales of cotton. This is said to be the largest cargo of cotton ever taken from any Atlantic port....At Fort Smith, Ark., a white man and a negro, both intoxicated, quarreled and drew revolvers. The white man was shot twice through the stomach and once through the lungs. The negro was shot once through the stomach. Both are dead.

A WASHINGTON dispatch says: "Gen. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, has made his report of the investigation in the South Carolina census matter to the Secretary of the Interior. Gen. Walker declines to give any information as to the nature of the report, and Assistant Secretary Hall will not authorize any statement in the absence of Secretary Schurz. It is confidently stated, however, by persons who claim to know, that Gen. Walker, in the report, holds the theory that the census of 1870 was defective, and that the census of 1880 is correct, and that the apparent discrepancies are to be attributed to the assumed imperfections in the former census."

GENERAL.

WALTER WINSOR, a 16-year-old murderer of Providence, Ontario, has been sentenced to a life term of imprisonment.

Two brothers at Richmond Hill, Ont., quarreled, and one dealt the other a fatal blow. The father saw the fight, and fell dead....Over 12,000,000 bushels of grain were shipped to Europe from this country during the month of September....Prof. Riley, the entomologist, who has spent several months in the South investigating the habits and ravages of the cotton-worm, announces that he has reached a stage in his investigation which leaves no doubt of his ability to put a stop to any future ravages on the part of the insect, if he only receives the active co-operation of the planters.

A NEW YORK dispatch of the 6th inst. says "the epidemic now raging among the horses is spreading to all the animals in the stables of the car and stage companies. It is estimated that 10,000 animals are suffering from the disease in New York and Brooklyn." The disease is also spreading in the cities of the Middle and Western States.

THE Mexican House of Representatives, by a large majority vote, has passed a resolution declaring Gen. Gonzales President of the republic. His term is to begin Dec. 1 next. The electoral vote stood as follows: Gonzales, 11,528; Benitez, 1,368; Mejia, 529; Cadena, 1,075; Vallarta, 185; Zamacona, 76; scattering, 285.

FOREIGN.

THE Australian International Exhibition was opened at Melbourne on the 1st of October, with great circumstance. The Marquis of Normandy, Governor of Victoria, and other high officials participated in the ceremony....The Mexican Congress was opened on the 21st of September. The Presidential election dispute was referred to the District Judge for settlement.

THE editors of the chief journals in St. Petersburg have been summoned before Gen. Melikoff, and told that their continued discussion of a constitution for Russia has highly displeased the Czar; that nothing more on the subject would be allowed to appear, and that during the present reign it would be premature to discuss the question of a constitution....The social warfare in Ireland, says a London dispatch, grows in intensity. The murder of the Viscount Mountmorris indicates the presence of the worst passions, and the likelihood of a revolt among the discontented peasantry. Lord Mountmorris was a poor, unknown nobleman, unpopular as a landlord, a magistrate and a neighbor. The motive of the murder is the subject of general discussion. Everybody in England denounces the crime as agrarian, and many call for coercive measures. The Irish organs declare it to be in no way connected with the land agitation, and urge the Government to resist the demand for repression.

A DUBLIN dispatch says that at a land meeting at Armagh there were cries of "Shoo the landlords;" "Down with the Queen and the Government." The leaders of the meeting afterward made inflammatory speeches at Newry, and great excitement prevailed. Ryan Foley, a farmer in Ballinlonan, County Sligo, has been murdered. One Boylan, a process-server, has been killed at Crossmaglan, County Armagh.

THE Italian Government is about to suppress the newly-arrived French Jesuits....Jacques Offenbach, the celebrated musician and composer, has just died in Paris, aged 61 years....Cable dispatches report that the Russian press is filled with reports of destitution and death in all parts of the interior of the empire, and that the granaries at Taganrog are being rapidly emptied to supply the suffering districts.

PARIS telegram: "One of the great dry-goods houses of Paris was visited one day last week by no less than 67,000 people. On Monday alone the same store sold goods to the value of $280,000. 'These are hard times,' say the French husbands."....Lieuts. Rogers Birnie and William H. Bixby, of the United States army, have been decorated with the cross of the Legion of Honor for their part in the recent military maneuvers in Paris on the occasion of the anniversary of the fall of the Bastile.

THE British Government has ordered the barracks at Athlone, Carlow, Sligo, and other places in the West of Ireland to be prepared for the full complement of troops they are capable of accommodating....A fire at Greenock destroyed the worsted mills of Fleming, Reid & Co., the largest in Scotland....Gen. Primrose, who was in command of the British troops at Candahar at the time Gen. Burrows was defeated at Kushk-i-Nakud, has been recalled to England, and will probably be placed on trial to answer for his conduct in connection with Burrows' defeat.

INDIANA NEWS.

THE cattle plague has struck Rushville. Fresh cows, with young calves, have "dried up" in a day.

WHILE making apple butter, Mrs. John Coombs, of Mulberry, set fire to her clothing and was so badly burned that she died.

COL. WILLIAM H. COLESCOTT, one of the most prominent citizens of Shelbyville, died suddenly there recently, at the age of 51 years.

A MAN named John Hicks, 80 years of age, has just been received at the Jeffersonville penitentiary on a two years' sentence. He has passed over fifty years of his long life in prison.

DRS. LAMAR and Flynn, of Marion, while out riding, the other evening, were thrown from their buggy by a runaway horse, dashed violently against a shade tree, and very badly hurt.

MRS. HARRIET DAVIS died in Franklin last week at the advanced age of 110 years. She was a Canadian and a colored woman. Her husband died a few years ago, being past 100 years at the time of his death.

As a number of persons were returning in hand-cars of the Grand Trunk line from South Bend, where they had been listening to Bob Ingersoll, an engine ran into the cars, killing two men, Westley McCombs and John Hough. Some others received serious bruises.

JUDGE D. M. HOOPER, formerly Mayor of New Albany, died there last week, of malarial fever, aged 78 years. He had been a resident of New Albany fifty-one years. He held a number of offices under the City Government during his life, and from 1837 to 1850 was proprietor of an extensive boat-building yard.

WILLIAM STORR, a well-known farmer, living near the Dismal swamp, in Washington township, Hamilton county, while working near the swamp was startled by the cry of a panther. Thinking it a child in the swamp, he began a search, carrying with him an ax. After walking a few rods in the dense thicket a full-grown female panther sprang on him. After a few minutes' struggle he succeeded in killing the panther.

THE golden wedding of Wm. C. and Hannah L. Bond, which was held at their home near Washington, was remarkable for the number and age of the guests. More than 100 of them witnessed the marriage of Mr. and Mrs. Bond, fifty years ago, and the groomsmen and bridesmaids were the same who accompanied them to the altar the first time. Seven couples were present who had celebrated their golden weddings.

LAST February a large amount of property at Evansville was offered for sale for delinquent taxes, but it was not bought in, as nobody there wished to profit by the impecuniosity of his neighbors. A man from Indianapolis had no such scruples, however, and he recently purchased about $100,000 worth of the jeopardized property. The Evansvillains now intend to test the constitutionality of the law which imposes a penalty of 25 per cent. on them.

A. H. LATHAM, manager of the American Union Telegraph, at Albany, Mo., and Miss Linnie Faris, of Pennville, Jay county, were married by telegraph, Rev. M. Parrett, of Portland, officiating. Miss Faris stood beside the minister, in the telegraph office, at Portland, while the ceremony was transmitted. She was attired in a neat dress of light goods, trimmed with drab satin and flowers. The ceremony occupied thirty-six minutes. The bride started for Albany, Mo., to join her husband.

BY the collision of a freight with a passenger train on the Vandalia road, nine miles west of Terre Haute, Austin Rankin, the engineer and George Saunders, the fireman of the passenger train, lost their lives, and five train hands were seriously injured—three, it is feared, fatally. The cause of the accident was the misinterpretation of a telegram by the conductor of the freight train. As he read the message, he thought he had two hours and fifty minutes to make Marshall, while the telegram really read that he had two hours and fifteen minutes. Not one of the passengers was in the least injured. The engines and cars were damaged $30,000 worth.

ABOUT three weeks ago, Annie C. Chaplin, daughter of a wealthy citizen and a Director of the First National Bank of Warsaw, presented a check for $300 to the Cashier of the above bank over her father's signature, and the Cashier, thinking it genuine, cashed it. During the day the father saw the check, and, upon inquiry, pronounced it a forgery, and caused the arrest of his daughter, and, in spite of her pleadings, she was lodged in jail, her own father refusing to bail her. After three days' confinement she confessed that one G. L. Smith, a sewing-machine agent was the forger. He was arrested and lodged in jail, but was admitted to bail. He swore vengeance on his betrayer, but no chance presented itself. Annie was in the jail yard. Smith watched his chance and sprang over the high board fence and upon his victim, shooting her twice. The first ball entered her heart; the second entered the head just behind the right ear. The first shot proved fatal, but to make it doubly sure he fired the second time, and then, placing the revolver to his head, he blew out his own brains, the blood and brains of both mingling in one common, sickening pool.

SLAVES IN THE EAST.

Terrible Scenes in a Constantinople Market Place.

[Correspondence of the Manchester Examiner.]

The headquarters of the white slave trade in Constantinople are in the Bostandchi quarter, which comprises a number of small, narrow streets between Pera, Galata and Tophane. The trade is conducted almost exclusively by a tribe of Circassians known as Tessirdchis. Families generally work together. One brother, for example, stops at home and minds the shop, while the other goes abroad and purchases and forwards the raw material of the commerce. Negotiations with purchasers are conducted through the intermediary of Arab brokers, who call regularly on their patrons to inquire if they are wanting anything in black eunuchs or white girls. The rendezvous of these gentry is a coffee house in the Bostandchi quarter, the entry to which is strictly forbidden to all save followers of the prophet. A white boy in good health, from eight to fourteen years old, costs from $180 to $200; if he has any acquirements, such, for instance, as a knowledge of cookery or other housework, he will command twice as much. A girl under ten years old may be had for $100, while a maiden between twelve and sixteen, especially if she can read and write and strum a little on the zittar, is worth $3,500. A female slave of exceptional beauty, young, white and a virgin—the style most in vogue are blondes and black eyes—brings from $4,400 to $6,000. For a choice specimen, with a smattering of French, and able to play a few airs on the piano, a rich amateur has been known to pay as much as $12,200. But, as may be supposed, the demand for articles of this description has greatly fallen off since the halcyon time of perpetual loans and profuse expenditure. Black slaves, who are brought principally from Africa, are either sold direct by the importers to the proprietors of harems or to dealers, two of whom have extensive marts in Stamboul. These two generally keep on hand one hundred to one hundred and twenty slaves each. There are also depots in Scutari and in several villages on the Bosphorus. A strong black slave sells for about $90; a black maiden, $67 to $75; a full eunuch, $315 to $400, and half eunuch, $135 to $225. Not the least interesting part of the account from which I quote is the writer's description of his visit to a slave dealer's den in the neighborhood of Scutari, the exact locality of which he was sworn not to reveal. His companion was an Arab broker, whom he had to backsheesh heavily for his services. He assumed the character and presented himself in the garb of a Hungarian renegade officer in the Turkish army, the ostensible object of his visit being the purchase of a halaika or house slave. The slave-dealer's warehouse was a large wooden building; the slave-dealer himself, a dignified Turk of the old school, bearded, turbaned and loftily polite. Pipes and coffee were of course produced, and, after a due interchange of complimentary phrases, business began. The dealer's head man, Hassam, a gigantic Nubian, was summoned, and told to bring forth a number of slaves for the inspection of the broker and his friend. Thirty negro women of various ages and a number of boys were then led into the room. These the broker, who had really a commission to buy two or three slaves, looked carefully over, made them open their mouths, pinched their ribs, tried their wind and examined their "points" as a horse-dealer examines the points of an animal which is offered to him for sale. In the end two women and one boy were selected as suitable for their purpose. Then began a long and almost interminable wrangle. The dealer asked $900. The broker laughed him to scorn and offered $60. Whereupon the Turk waxed scornfully indignant, but in consideration of the rank of his guests offered to come down to $220. Then more coffee and fresh pipes were ordered and, after a tremendous palaver and an immense consumption of tobacco, the lot was knocked down for $190. The purchase, it was agreed, should be sent for and the dealer's little bill settled on the following day.

J. P. BENJAMIN has arrived in New York city, after riding on horseback from Fort Worth, Texas, a distance of 2,400 miles. He resides in New York, went to Texas on business, and made the trip home on horseback in order to see the country. He started on the 10th of May, and made the journey in 110 days.

Vegetine.

More to Me than Gold.

WALPOLE, MASS., March 7, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:
I wish to inform you what VEGETINE has done for me. I have been troubled with Eczema Humor for more than thirty years, in my limbs and other parts of my body, and have been a great sufferer. I commenced taking VEGETINE one year ago last August, and can truly say it has done more for me than any other medicine. I seem to be perfectly free from the humor and can recommend it to every one. Would not be without this medicine—'tis more to me than gold—and I feel it will prove a blessing to others as it has to me.
Yours, most respectfully,
MRS. DAVID CLARK.

J. BENTLEY, M. D., says:

It has done more good than all Medical Treatment.

NEWMARKET, ONT., Feb. 9, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS, Boston, Mass.:
Sir—I have sold during the past year a considerable quantity of your VEGETINE, and I believe in all cases it has given satisfaction. In one case, a delicate young lady of about seventeen years was much benefited by its use. Her parents informed me that it had done her more good than all the medical treatment to which she had previously been subjected.
Yours respectfully,
J. BENTLEY, M. D.

Loudly in Its Praise.

TORONTO, ONT., March 3, 1880.
Dear Sir—Considering the short time that VEGETINE has been before the public here, it sells well as a blood purifier, and for troubles arising from a sluggish or torpid liver it is a first-class medicine. Our customers speak loudly in its praise.
J. WRIGHT & CO.,
Cor. Queen and Elizabeth Streets.

HORATIO SEYMOUR.

The Sage of Utica Warns the Country Against What the Republicans Call Nationalism.

A Dissection of Gen. Garfield's Theories as to This Election and of His Plans if He Should Win.

(Extracts from a Speech Delivered at Utica, N. Y.)

FELLOW-CITIZENS: "It must not be forgotten that this Government is no longer the simple machinery it was in the early days of the republic. The bucolic age of America is over. The interests the Government has to deal with are no longer those of a small number of agricultural communities with here and there a commercial town. They are the interests of nearly 50,000,000 of people spread over an immense surface, with occupations, pursuits and industries of endless variety and great magnitude; large cities with elements of population scarcely known here in the early days, and all the producing aspirations and interests so pushing, powerful and complicated in their nature and so constantly appealing to the Government, rightfully or wrongfully, that the requirements of statesmanship demanded in this age are far different from those which sufficed a century ago."

These are not my words. If I had uttered them it would be felt that I was making a harsh charge against the administration. They are statements put forth by one of its officials, who speaks from his experience as a member of the Cabinet, and as one who formerly had a seat in the Senate. This declaration made by Mr. Schurz is official in character. It will be so viewed in other countries and will rejoice the enemies of our Government while it mortifies the American people.

Until within the past twenty years the Executive, the Legislative, the Judicial Departments gave honest construction to the constitution. They did not seek to usurp power by strained definition. They sought to carry out its spirit. They did not summon crowds of men with schemes, who were pushing, rightfully or wrongfully, to get at the public treasury, by calling this a nation and teaching the false doctrine that we should follow the usages of other, and not the constitutional law of our own Government.

The leaders in the canvass on that side are those that hold places as Senators or as Cabinet Ministers or important positions under the present administration. All of them in fact and in some form ask that their powers should be increased by taking from the people some of their home rights. They say in effect, give us your rights of making laws for yourselves, we can take care of your interests better than you can. Every demand for jurisdiction for the General Government is a demand for the surrender of rights by the people in their towns, their counties or their States. Mr. Garfield openly expresses his satisfaction and his desire if he is elected President that the Government should have more power than it had when Washington and Adams and Jefferson and Jackson filled the Executive chair. He says there has been a gain, and that there will be more by force of gravitation; not by the popular will, nor by changes in the constitution in a regular way, but that authority, patronage and power will add to themselves, will by their own weight increase and grow until they are up to the full measure of his desire. He rejoices to see this done in a way against which George Washington warned you in his farewell address, which was submitted to Alexander Hamilton and other statesmen before he gave it to the American people.

Another member of the Cabinet, Mr. Sherman, Secretary of the Treasury, takes a different view of the state of affairs from that given by his colleague. He dwells upon the business prosperity of our country. Overlooking the industry of our people, the favorable seasons that have rewarded their labors with ample harvests, the demands for our products from other countries, he claims for the administration the gratitude of our people for all their blessings. I have no unkindly feelings for Mr. Sherman. I regret that he does himself a wrong when he is ungrateful to God and unjust to the laborer of the land. It was not the statesmanship of the Cabinet, but the statesmanship of the plow, blessed by a fruitful season, that gives us our growing wealth. Not the skill of the Treasury Department, but of mechanics and manufacturers, that make the springs of our prosperity; not the talk in Congress, but the toil of labor in all its varied fields. In another respect he does himself a wrong. He does not warn our people of the danger which the change of seasons may make. He does not, as he should, admonish them that at this time, when money is abundant, men should throw off the burdens of debt, and extricate themselves from positions of peril, if times should change. He teaches the false and mischievous doctrine that Government policies, and not honest toil and frugal care, that the schemes of the brain, not the sweat of the brow, give competence to men. Much has been said about the absurdity of fiat money. How much more absurd are Mr. Sherman's teachings of fiat prosperity. In this direction Mr. Sherman outstrips Denis Kearney.

The points most conspicuous in the speeches and journals of the Republican party are, first, that this is a nation, and next, this election is a contest between the Northern and Southern States, in which a victory will be a great gain to the former party. We charge that the denunciations of the South are used to mask their designs to get jurisdiction over all the Union and mainly over the interests and people of the North, as they are the most important and varied; that the term "nation" is selected because it is a word of obscure and indefinite meaning, and if it is substituted for the legal and proper title of Government it will enable them to make changes in its character hurtful to the rights of the people and disastrous to the prosperity of their business and industrial pursuits; that the mischief it will create will not be for the remote future, but they are pressing upon us now and will be felt in their full force from this time on, unless they are averted by the results of the pending elections.

It is a marked and conspicuous fact in the political discussions of the past four years that the Republican leaders have sought to bring into use the words "nation" and "nationalism" when speaking of our country. These have been heretofore used without any special significance as terms generally applied to different divisions of the human race into communities governed by some forms of law. We always find that the men who use the word—and many like Senator Blaine love to call it a sovereign nation—are in favor of a different construction of the constitution than has heretofore prevailed. Mr. Garfield openly states this when he says that the views held by Mr. Hamilton are growing in strength, and he rejoices that our Government is gravitating to more power. We find, too, that they favor the plans of the same distinguished statesmen of gaining jurisdiction by constructions put upon the words of the constitution. As they do not like at this moment to develop all their plans, which would excite alarm, particularly at the North, to mask their purposes and to divert attention by exciting passions and prejudices, they use the word as far as they can in connection with sectional controversies, so that it may be felt they only have in view the strength of the Union. It is this idea which gives their phrases a measure of favor with the Republican party. They also take great pains in their discussions to carry the idea that nationality means something favorable to the interests of the North. We charge that the purposes of the Republican leaders are in conflict with the constitution; that they endanger the peace, the order and the safety of the Union. They draw to the national Capitol hordes of men who have selfish and corrupt objects, who tempt officials to violate duty from motives of ambition and greed for gold. They impair the interests and prosperity of different sections of our Union by laws framed by men ignorant of the subject upon which they act and by legislation not only in conflict with the letter of the constitution, but with its spirit and the genius of all our political institutions, both local and general.

It must not be thought that the changes which men seek to make in the character of our Government by the use of the words nation and nationalism, and by the constructions which they mean to put upon them, relate only to the theory of politics; that their influences are too uncertain and remote to be of immediate concern. They affect us now. They not only threaten but work disastrous results to the commerce of our country, to the interests of the farmers of the Western States, and to the business prosperity of the whole country. We know that cheap transportation has led to the sale of our farm products in Europe and has lifted all kinds of business from the depression which a short time since was felt by all pursuits. The ability to send what we make and raise to the markets of the world at cheap rates is of more importance to the North than to the South. The products of the latter are of a kind that do not suffer from the competition of other countries. Europe must have the cotton of the South. Increased cost of transportation does not prevent their sale; it adds to cost to the consumer. The farmers and manufacturers of the North have to compete with those who make or raise the same products in the markets which we seek to gain. A small difference in the cost of carrying will prevent our grain and provisions from going abroad.

We find that many fair-minded men receive the terms nation and national with favor because they have vague ideas that they will give more strength to the General Government and security to our Union. We all seek to make our Government strong. We all pray that our Union may stand forever. But it is a fatal error to suppose that the strength of a Government grows out of the amount and not the beneficence of its power. There is truth in the maxim that the government is best which governs least. That which gives the largest measure of freedom, rights of conscience, of persons and of property. That government is the most enduring which lifts up its citizens into a sense of the right and duties of their positions, which trains them to watch and guard the public welfare, which makes them bold, free and enterprising, and imbues them with the proud feeling that government belongs to them and not they to government. Let us turn our eyes from this system which thus gives strength and duration to the despotisms of the world where all jurisdictions are in the hands of monarchs, upheld by all the powers of the state, its treasures and its armies.

The thrones which topple in civilized Europe are those which are overloaded by jurisdiction. The monarch who holds unlimited sway over the greatest empire, who commands vast armies, who claims control over the lives, liberties and conscience of men is the one who dares not walk the streets of his capital. He trembles for his life in the recesses of his palace. This dread of assassination or revolution does not grow out of personal defects of character, but from the principles of government which constantly bring him in collision with the conscience, the aspirations and the interests of his subjects. In marked contrast with this we find another great empire that is governed by a woman, whose appearance in the streets of her capital is hailed with acclamations of loyalty and affection. But her jurisdiction is divided with Parliament, and shielded from prejudice and passion by distribution of powers. It is not true that any power given to a government which brings it in conflict with any class of the citizen or any section of its domain gives it strength. It was on account of this truth that our enemies in Europe predicted at the outset that our Union could not stand because it had to deal with territories so broad and interests so varied. It has been the marvelous wisdom which distributed jurisdiction between different local departments that has carried it safely and triumphantly through the first century of its existence. Our great political duty is to keep it strong by saving it from the exercise of jurisdiction which shall excite hostility toward it. Its strength must ever lie in the affections of our people. Its duration will depend upon the fact that its actions will be beneficent to all and hurtful to none.

I beg our Republican friends to look at the attitude of Mr. Garfield with regard to the constitution and see if it is one that shows loyalty to its provisions. It is the bond of our Union. It is the charter of our rights and liberties. He has on many occasions sworn to uphold it. On the 4th of March next he will, as a Senator from Ohio, take a solemn oath to support its provisions. The Senate was organized to assert and defend the letter and its spirit. Does the conduct of Mr. Garfield accord with these oaths? He avoids the use of the titles it gives the Government. These were selected to show its character and object. He uses in a marked way words the framers of the constitution rejected and shuns those they selected. What could be thought of a clergyman who should substitute for the grand, clear tones of the Bible vague and unmeaning words which obscure the law of Christian life? Yet in this way Mr. Garfield treats the law which makes the life of our Union. In view of his efforts to change the constitution by substituting construction for its language, you doubt if, in his oath of office, he swears for or at the constitution. You wonder what he seeks, which is rebuked by the title of the "United States," the "Union," the "General Government." What leads him to dwell upon the words "Nation" or "Nationalism," which are weak, obscure and trivial? Let us see how Mr. Garfield looks at his interest and position. We can give his ideas almost in his own words when he communes with himself. He says: "I am to be a Senator from Ohio for six years. Hamilton was right when he said that Senators should hold for life. I am glad that his opinions grow in favor. He did not like our constitution, but said everything depended upon the way it was construed. This heavy volume on my table called the civil list shows the names of more than 70,000 men paid from the treasury. This does not include the soldiers or sailors. 'I am glad to see we are gravitating towards more power.' The Senate, of which I am a member, gives most of these men their places directly or indirectly. They depend upon confirmation by us of the President's nominations. In view of this fact he usually sends in the names of those we want. If he does not, we throw them out. While large numbers of those in the civil list are not acted upon by our body, yet as a rule they hold under those we confirm, so they all look to us for support. If we can make the civil list up to 150,000 we shall be able to hold our places for life."

These plain words give you the theories of Mr. Garfield and his friends about this election and their plans for the future. What they say and do shows you what they aim at. Will it not be wise on the part of the great Republican party to learn and think who will be the victors and who will be the victims if they have their own way in this election? If they do not do this they may fall into the trap set for the people, and then we all shall feel that nationalism is a curse.

Turn from Mr. Garfield's letter of acceptance to that of Gen. Hancock. He bows to the decrees of the constitution. He accepts its teachings, he is imbued with its faith; its terms to him are sacred; his earnestness shines out in every line, and when he swears to support the constitution in its letter and spirit we know he means to do so. Those who formed it not only chose fitting words to tell its meaning, but patriotism, like religion, has its symbols. No flag which floats in the wind of heaven tells so much as ours of the history and character of the Government it represents. Its stripes recall the States which fought the battle which gave us liberty, and which crowned our glorious work by forming our Union. The States are numbered by the stars which glitter upon its blue field. He who would strike one star from its place, or who would blend or blur these symbols so that they would tell only of obscure nationalism, has latent treason in his heart.

We are asked why we took a soldier for our standard-bearer? To whom can we intrust it with more safety than to one who has had its deep and grand significance burnt into his very being by the fires of battle fields?

There is not a color upon its folds, there is not a stripe upon its emblazonry, there is not a star upon its azure ground that has not been made sacred by him. The appeal which drew him and his fellow-soldiers from their homes to the battle field was to rally round the stars and stripes and to uphold the Union. They will never make our flag an unmeaning thing; they will see to it that it remains a true emblem of the spirit of our constitution. By the people's vote Gen. Hancock will bear this standard on to victory in this contest as he has heretofore done on the bloody fields of battle. He has learned from it the grand purposes of the constitution by teachings amid all the solemn lessons of war, by the inspirations of the battle field, by the sad and solemn aspects of the blood-stained earth and the dying groans of men when the struggle has ended. He has learned the great lessons of statesmanship, not amid scenes of party strife, not in an atmosphere tainted by personal ambition or schemes of plunder, but where Washington and Jackson learned the lesson of duty to their country and of obedience to its laws and constitution. It is now charged by our opponents that we are inconsistent when we place a soldier at the head of the Government. The propriety of doing this depends upon the character of the man and the nature of the service upon which he has been engaged. The General who has fought only for victory or a conquest, or has been engaged only to promote schemes of ambition or gratify feelings of hate, has been taught upon the battle-field only lessons of force and violence. But those who have dared the perils of war to free their country of oppression, to gain for it an independent Government, to resist hostile invasions or to uphold it against resistance to its rightful authority, have their mind filled with objects instructive, ennobling and patriotic.

With intellects quickened by all the dangers and excitements of the strife they see more clearly than other men the value of obedience to laws and the duty of sacrificing all things for their country's good. It was in this school that Washington learned the grand duty of laying down his sword and retiring to private life when the world thought he would claim a crown as his reward. This act, so constantly referred to in other lands as well as our own, gave him his immortality.

It was in the same school, under like influences, that in the hour of victory Jackson curbed and restrained his fiery spirit and submitted to injustice and indignity because it was imposed upon him by a legal tribunal.

"If called to the Presidency I should deem it my duty to resist, with all my power, any attempt to impair or evade the full force and effect of the constitution, which, in every article, section and amendment, is the supreme law of the land."—Winfield Scott Hancock.

He who has learned to obey rightful authority has been taught the great lesson which fits him to exercise authority. He who reverences the laws of his country is the right man to administer them. He who has proved his devotion to its interests is the one to whom we can most safely trust the work of guarding and protecting them. Therefore we placed him in nomination, and go into this contest with the firm faith that we shall elevate him to the position of President of these United States.

GARFIELD AND THE IRISH.

Some Interesting Reading for Irish-American Voters.

Gen. M. R. M. Wallace, of Chicago, recently delivered a stirring campaign speech to the Democrats of Indianapolis. He gave his reasons as a Union soldier for preferring Hancock to Garfield, and made many telling points. But the feature of his speech was his denunciation of Garfield's hostility to Irish aspirations for liberty, of Garfield's bigotry toward the Little Sisters of the Poor, and of his niggardly opposition to placing the late Gen. Shields on the pension list. The following is the portion of Gen. Wallace's speech relating to Gen. Garfield and the Irish:

I come now to a novel feature of the canvass—the attempt of the Republicans, in their last desperate effort, to win the friendship of a class of people whom they have always treated with contempt—the Irish-Americans.

The appeal of the radicals to the Irish-Americans to save them or they perish would be supremely impertinent with any candidate. But with Garfield no language can justly describe the degree of insolence which the appeal implies.

Let us see what claim Garfield has upon the Irish. Mr. Garfield was a Representative in Congress in 1867. During the first session of the Fortieth Congress, on the 8th day of March, 1867, the Hon. Fernando Wood, of New York, asked unanimous consent to offer a resolution of sympathy with the Irish people. Mr. Broomall, a Republican, objected. Mr. Wood then moved to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution. Upon this question there were 104 yeas and 14 nays.

Of these fourteen there were thirteen Republicans, and of these thirteen two are now Republican candidates; one of them is James A. Garfield, Republican candidate for President; the other is Shelby M. Cullom, Republican candidate for Governor of Illinois.

I read the resolution, so that all fair-minded men may judge whether or not any lover of liberty could consistently vote against it, and whether or not any American Congressman who remembered the loyal sacrifices of Irishmen in the Union army—the countrymen and comrades of Sheridan, Shields, Corcoran and Mulligan—should have opposed it. Nay more, strike out Ireland and substitute Cuba, Poland, Zululand or any other struggling and oppressed nationality, and I ask, What honest lover of liberty should vote against it? The language of the resolution was this:

"Resolved, That this House extends its sympathy to the people of Ireland in their pending struggle for constitutional liberty. If the despotic Governments in Europe shall be allowed to establish monarchical institutions in America, so should the United States foster and promote the extension of republican institutions in Europe."

During the Fenian invasion of Canada, a number of prisoners were captured by the British authorities. Among them was a priest, Rev. Father McMahon. This priest probably remembered the centuries of wrongs which his country had suffered at the hands of the British Government and sympathized with the invasion. But his purpose in accompanying the little army was to do a priest's duty—to minister to the spiritual wants of his countrymen. With a view to securing the release of this Irish-American clergyman and all the other prisoners then held in Canada, on the 17th day of April, 1871, Mr. Kinsella, of New York, offered the following resolution, and moved the suspension of the rules and its adoption:

"WHEREAS, A conference is now being held between joint high commissioners representing the Government of the United States and that of Great Britain; and

"WHEREAS, It is expected and desired that the several questions which keep up unkind feeling between the people of the respective countries shall be settled through the labors of such joint high commissioners; and,

"WHEREAS, The prolonged incarceration in the prisons of the Dominion of Canada of persons accused of violating the neutrality laws is a source of irritation to a large number of American citizens; therefore,

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be respectfully requested to have the case of such persons presented before such joint high commission, to the end that their release may be effected."

James A. Garfield objected to the suspension of the rules, and then voted against the resolution directing the President to use his influence to secure the liberation of a non-combatant clergyman, and a few poor men who had been in prison several years. And now Irish-Americans are asked to support him for the Presidency!

I come to another event in Mr. Garfield's Congressional life. The Sundry-Civil Appropriation bill of the first session of the Forty-third Congress was sent back from the Senate to the House with certain amendments, including one appropriating $25,000 to the "Little Sisters of the Poor." The "Little Sisters of the Poor," I need hardly say, is an organization of charitable ladies whose lives are devoted to the care of the aged poor, and who never inquire what is the creed of the poor, or whether they have any creed or not. Mr. Garfield opposed the appropriation on the flimsy ground that it was for a sectarian institution. Gen. Butler called Mr. Garfield's attention to the fact that there was also an appropriation of $35,000 which had received his sanction for the "Woman's Christian Association" of Washington. Mr. Garfield replied that no woman, not a Catholic, could be a corporator in this charity managed by the "Little Sisters of the Poor." Gen. Butler replied that no woman not a Protestant could be a corporator in the "Woman's Christian Association." Yet Mr. Garfield persisted in his opposition and voted against the appropriation, notwithstanding it was defended by such leading Republicans as Gen. Butler, Mr. Hoar, of Massachusetts, Mr. John Cessna, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Parker, of Missouri.

I say that only the most relentless fanatic, the most intolerant bigot could have opposed this item; especially when he favored an item giving the same sum, at the same time, to another charity merely because it was under the control of ladies who worshiped the same God according to the rules of a different creed.

I say, also, that if James A. Garfield had not deserted his comrades on the field of battle to go to Congress at a time when even Rutherford B. Hayes said that a man who left the army to go to Congress ought to be scalped, he would have forgotten the creed of the "Little Sisters of the Poor," and all the other charitable bands of sisters who flitted over the battle-fields to minister to the maimed and the suffering. Had he remained to fight down the rebellion instead of coming home to talk it down in the safety and comfort which surrounded a seat in Congress, he could have borne testimony to the fact that the sisters who do charity never asked the wounded or the dying what their creed was, or whether or not they had any creed. Had he waited on the battle-field to do more than smell powder, had he been shot down like Hancock, had he increased his sword only when the enemy surrendered, he would have favored this appropriation as Grant did, for you will remember Grant was President, and approved the appropriation Garfield fought. However much we may differ about Grant's course at other times, he was a soldier in the hour of his country's peril. Grant then faced the danger of Lee on his front, and kept facing the danger until Lee surrendered. Garfield was then facing the temptation of rotten paving fees and Credit Mobilier shares, and kept facing them until he surrendered. I am not Irish. I am not a Catholic. I am an American and a Protestant. I say, in no boastful spirit, that I was a soldier during the war of the Rebellion. It was simply my duty to be a soldier then. But, American and Protestant as I am, I should be an ingrate did not I bear testimony to the services of Catholic sisters in the hospital, on the march, and on the field of battle during those terrible years.

They nursed the sick. They bathed the feverish. They fed the famishing. They held the saving, cooling draught to the lips of the scorched and thirsty. They soothed the dying, and stole its cruel terrors from death. Heaven only can reward their labors commensurately; and the tongue must have more than human inspiration which can acknowledge their sacrifices.

It remained for the man who fled from the battlefield, where they remained, to demand what creed they professed who never asked the soldier his creed before they ministered to him! It remained for the bigot in politics to vote public money to a charitable organization representing his creed, and to refuse it to these nurses of his country's soldiers because their creed is not his! It remained for that runaway from the battlefields, and that ungrateful bigot in politics, to ask the suffrages of the Irish-American voters to make him President.

In the Forty-fifth Congress, a few months before the death of brave old James Shields—jurist, statesman and soldier—a man whose long years of fidelity to his adopted country, and of bravery in her defense, should have made all men forget where he was born, and remember only the country and cause for which he fought—a bill was introduced in the House authorizing the President to appoint the hoary and intrepid veteran a Brigadier General in the United States army, on the retired list, with rank and pay from and after the passage of the act. It was then known that that hero of three wars—the ex-Supreme Court Judge of Illinois, the only man who had ever represented three States in the United States Senate—was fast approaching his end. The bony hands of the grim specter were stretching forth to clutch the valorous frame that had defied foreign foe and domestic traitor; the once strong body, riddled with balls and scarred and seamed with wounds, was not to hold together much longer. He had been stricken with paralysis. To wounds and disease was added one more misfortune—poverty. On the bench as a Judge; in the camp and on the march as a soldier; in the halls of public deliberation as a maker of his country's laws, he had been what all ages and all nations have agreed is "God's noblest work"—an honest man. He had never robbed the enemy he conquered. He had never despoiled the people who reposed their trust in him. No bribe had stained the hands that had drawn a patriot's sword. No improper inducements, thinly disguised as "fees," had procured the exercise of his influence with heads of corrupt and corrupting combinations. He never bought nor was he ever presented with stock in corporations whose interests required legislation to be modified by his voice and his vote. For all these reasons he was a poor man and his poverty was extreme. The bill to place him on the retired list would have furnished, at a very small cost to his country, comfort and security for the very short period which his wounds would permit him to live; and against that bill was recorded the vote of the soldier who ran away from the battle-fields to the politician's spoils; of the Know-Nothing who opposed the resolution sympathizing with the efforts of the Irish people to obtain for themselves in their own land the liberty they fought and died to secure for us; and of the bigot who voted to give public money to a religious organization of Protestants and withhold it from a charitable organization of Catholic women whose benevolence was administered without regard to creed. James A. Garfield crowned his unworthy record by voting against the bill which would have made comfortable and contended the few remaining days of aged, brave, honest, noble, poor and sick James Shields! For this, fellow-citizens, make him President of the United States!

You, especially, my Irish-American fellow-citizens, you, especially, are harangued by demagogues now. It was always consistent toward you. From agogues to vote for him. You know his record 1867 to 1870 he never missed an opportunity to scorn your race and to pour out his contempt on your aspirations. His record is before you. The people of the United States abhor intolerance, no matter who may practice it. The executive functions dignified by the elevated and liberal spirit of a Washington shall never be disgraced by a Know-Nothing and a bigot.

JUDGE BLACK ON GARFIELD.

The Great Jurist's Estimate of the Public Character of the Republican Candidate—His Incapacity to Distinguish the Point Where Fidelity to Party May Be Treachery to Country.

Judge Jere S. Black, of Pennsylvania, has recently written a letter to Augustus Schell, of New York, from which we make the following copious extract:

The impulses of friendship and the duties of fair political opposition alike require me to speak of Gen. Garfield. Intellectually he is first among the politicians of his party; not the sharpest or strongest, but the most gifted and best cultivated. His private life is stainless, and in everything unconnected with politics his behavior is regulated by principles of the soundest morality; but in public affairs he does not act upon his convictions. When he passes into the domain of politics his conscience loses its grip, and for his party he is willing to do any wrong which will promote their interests or play any card, how false soever, which will win them power. This surrender of his moral and mental integrity is the condition upon which he holds high place in the affections of the party he belongs to.

Treachery to his country is fidelity to his faction. If at any time in the last fifteen years he had given way to his own sense of right, supported the constitution and laws in a spirit of pure justice, refused to defile himself with election frauds, withheld countenance from executive corruption, or denounced the forcible installment of thieves in state offices, he would have converted himself into a Democrat, and been expelled from the communion of the anti-constitutional party. This moral prostitution to bad political purposes is far from being uncommon. Men naturally good have yielded to it in all times and in all countries where there is a party unprincipled enough to demand it and strong enough to reward it. But Gen. Garfield's public career furnishes more striking examples of it than the history of any individual I have known. Let me give you a case.

After the war, at a time of perfect peace, in the State of Indiana, where no war had ever been, certain military officers, being instructed from Washington that they were above the civil authorities, had kidnapped and were about to kill three citizens, for no offense defined by law and without the pretense of a trial by jury. If this could be done, there was manifestly no security for life or property. Plainly it could not be done without a flat violation of the constitution, which in express terms forbade it. But the man who then ruled with a rod of iron insisted upon it, and we could not be sure that the Judges, State and national, might not be subdued by their influence. The hearing of the cause before the Supreme Court was a great crisis in the history of our country. There was a place in the argument which nobody could fill so well as Gen. Garfield, and I brought him to help us in this desperate extremity to rescue American liberty from the utter destruction with which it was threatened. He responded with noble alacrity, and made a great argument, in which he proved not only the continued existence, but the inestimable value of the constitution. He demonstrated that the right of trial by jury at all times and all places was indestructible, and that any officer, civil or military, would violate his oath if he attempted to put the military above the civil authority. He affirmed the whole Democratic doctrine on the subject, and showed it to be incontestibly right. His sincerity was undoubted; for, like the rest of us, he engaged in the cause as a labor of love, without fee or any reward except the thanks of true men. Such were his true convictions. But when he came to deal with the same subject in his political capacity he surrendered everything to his party. He voted for a military despotism and a regular system of kidnapping and murder in all the States of the South. In the same act were other provisions, which he certainly understood to be in direct conflict with every article and every section of the constitution. In all this he did not transgress, like others, in ignorance and passion. He sinned against light and knowledge, and on cold calculation of partisan policy. It is an infinite pity that such a man should not only be false to his country but false to himself.

What makes all this very much worse is his denunciation of Gen. Hancock for saying that the military was constitutionally subordinate to the civil power, and that liberty was still the inheritance of the American people; for these were propositions which he himself had asserted and knew to be true. It might be expected that the course of a man so influenced would frequently deflect from the straight path, and one great aberration we cannot but remember. Mr. Tilden was elected in 1876. A false return was the only resource against him. I do not believe that Gen. Garfield, if left alone, would commit an election fraud any more than he would steal a horse or a sheep; but when the managers of his party demanded his aid in a great swindle he could not refuse. Under that coercion he went down to Louisiana, and there found it absolutely certain that the Tilden electors had been "duly appointed" at a legal and full poll, so peacefully conducted that there was not even a squabble about it in the whole State, and the appointment so made was attested by and recorded upon the certificates and the oaths of election officers adverse to the appointees in all their feelings and wishes. There was no earthly excuse for denying this. No contradiction of it could be honest. To count the State for Hayes was a thing that could be done only by impudent and unmitigated fraud. For a time I hoped that Gen. Garfield's share in that great crime had consisted in passive acquiescence; and I am surprised by the proofs recently brought forward of his active assistance in its perpetration. His judgment as a member of the Electoral Commission was a thing to be expected, for he must long before that have convinced himself that a fraud was as good a way as any other of electing a President. In a political game he did not think that anybody had moral sense enough to abstain from throwing a die which he himself had loaded to win the stake.

The liability to be rushed into evil courses by his party associates has brought upon him much odium which he does not deserve in the transactions of the Credit Mobilier. The stock distributed by Oakes Ames was intended to influence the legislation of Congress corruptly. He and the company who put it into his hands meant business, and that business was bribery. Undoubtedly those members who took it, knowing the nature of the thing, were great criminals, and wholly unworthy to retain their seats; but Gen. Garfield, though he certainly agreed to take the stock, and did actually take dividends upon it, had no suspicion of its connection with the Union Pacific railroads, or of the conflict which its possession might create between his private interests and his public duty. He was as guiltless as the child unborn of any dishonest meaning about the whole business. I believe this, not merely because he told me so, but because it is probable in itself and corroborated by many circumstances. If he had stuck to it he would have been credited by all men as implicitly as he was by me. Fearing that his political friends might influence him to depart from it, I wrote beseeching him to stand fast upon the defense he had made to me. That he did not take this advice is the bitterest regret of his life. But "the party" would not let him take it. The accusation struck at the highest heads in the House and Senate. They had but one answer, and that was a positive denial of the fact that any stock had ever been taken by them; and on that line they expected Mr. Ames to swear them through. Gen. Garfield, for the benefit of others and to his own great injury, united in making this false defense. Then witnesses failed them, and they were all convicted. After the report of the committee I wrote to Mr. Blaine the letter which has been extensively published, and which was an effort to put Gen. Garfield back upon the true ground which he never ought to have abandoned; but it was too late. I regret sincerely that Gen. Garfield is a candidate, or that he should be placed in any position which calls for criticism on his conduct as a public man; but I have said nothing that will be new to him, for in many forms at many times, in sundry ways, publicly and privately, I have given this same construction of his acts, and exhorted him to come out from the evil and corrupt fellowship which drags him down while it pretends to elevate him.

THE SOUTHERN BUGABOOS.

A Southern Congressman on the Results of the War as Final, North and South.

Quoting, then, the eloquent passage from Hancock's letter of acceptance, in which he speaks of the Union as the main pillar in the edifice of our real independence, Mr. Herbert added that if we could only get the masses of the North, those who are honest voters and not office-seekers, to understand and know that this is the sentiment that actuates us, that we recognize the results of the war fully, that we support the constitution with all its amendments, that we protect and guard the rights of these freedmen who constitute so large a part of this audience, we should add thousands of votes to Hancock in November. But every vile slander that ingenuity can invent and malice can perpetrate is being distilled into the ears of the Northern people. John Sherman, in a speech made at Cincinnati, actually stooped so low as to tell the people of the North that if the Democracy got in power the South would claim pay for its slaves. I see that Porter, candidate for Governor, is repeating the same stuff in Indiana on the stump. The idea is so preposterous that it passes my understanding that any voter could be influenced by it, but such men as Porter and Sherman would not condescend to use such an argument if they did not believe they could make votes by it. To catch a vote there is nothing that they would not say. This is a hard saying, but I am justified in it when men of their intelligence resort to such arguments. Look at it. The South contains scarcely more than one-third of the voting population of the Union. The slaveholders were not a third of the Southern white people. Since the freedmen have become voters the former slaveholders are not more than one-eighth of our voters. To pay this one-eighth of our people we would have to saddle the other seven-eighths of our people with a debt of one hundred and fifty billions of dollars. Why, if we were separated from the North by a gulf so wide and deep that the lightning of the telegraph could not leap it, we could not pass such a law. Fellow-citizens, this is a Democratic district. I am the Democratic nominee. I believe I am acceptable to the party, but if I should seriously announce to the people that I was in favor of taxing the voters who were never slaveholders to pay those who were, I could not be elected. I could not carry a county in the district. There is not a district in the South that could be carried on any such platform. When, then, Mr. Sherman announces that there is danger that the former slaveholders of the South will make the whole United States pay one hundred and fifty billions of dollars for liberated slaves—well, my friends, I will only say he knows better.

Another slander he indulges in is that if Democracy is successful we will endeavor to pension Confederate soldiers for the Confederate war. Gentlemen, I was a Confederate. I bear on my person scars received in fighting under the Southern cross. I yield to no man in love for my dead comrades or in sympathy for the living heroes of that Confederacy. Yet it never came into my mind in the wildest flights of my imagination, nor did it ever cross yours, that the Government of the United States or any other government could afford to pension soldiers for fighting against it. It is equally untrue that we could or would embarrass the Government with claims for quartermasters' stores taken during the war. All that class of claims, like slavery and secession, were settled by the war. All we ask is the right of local self-government. We don't want to control the domestic affairs of Indiana. They know how to govern themselves in those matters better than we do, and we know how to control our domestic affairs better than they do. We want a fair share in the blessings of honest government. We demand to be admitted to a full and free participation in its benefits as equals, and we do not expect the Government to enrich its people, for the Government has nothing but what it takes from the people. But I cannot waste time in answering Sherman's slanders here before this audience. I only wish the people who listened to him were down here to listen to me and to shake you by the hands and talk to you. Then they would find out how the people of the South are slandered and they would spurn their deceivers from them, and in November next they would rise in their might and rebuke by an overwhelming defeat this Republican party as a disturber of the peace of the people.

Gen. Sickles for Hancock.

Gen. Daniel E. Sickles, who lost a leg while bravely leading his corps at the battle of Gettysburg, who has been a Republican since the close of the war, and who served as Minister to Spain during the first administration of President Grant, has openly espoused the cause of his old comrade in arms, Gen. Hancock. In the course of a speech delivered in New York recently he said:

Although withdrawn for some time past from any part in politics, I cannot be an indifferent spectator of a Presidential canvass in which a distinguished and esteemed comrade is named for the highest office in the gift of the country he has so brilliantly served. No one need be afraid to confide the Presidency to a soldier who fought for the Union as Hancock fought. Among all the illustrious men who have been called to the Chief Magistracy none have more commended themselves to the favor of the people by a scrupulous adherence to the best traditions of our public life. Unused to the arts of a politician, separated by his profession from political organizations and never seeking office, his nomination by a vote that represented all parts of a reunited country is a pledge of fraternal feeling that will become a guarantee of peace and union in his election. The wiser opinion of the day is against sectional politics. Enjoying universal tranquillity and prosperity, appeals to old sectional animosities are offensive to the good feeling and common sense of the people. New York desires cordial relations with all her sister States; and, accepting Southern support of Hancock as a fresh bond of Union, the "solid" support is proof of "solid" loyalty. Gen. Hancock will do his duty. Politicians will not control him. Neither factions nor sections will intimidate him. He will execute the laws of the land—with all their safeguards and guarantees—without fear or favor. The support he receives in the South rebukes, if it does not silence, geographical prejudices. And if the North refused its favor to one of the greatest of its commanders, the reproach of ingratitude that would rest upon us might challenge unwelcome comparisons with our late adversaries. The North is not ungrateful. Gettysburg deserves to name a President—and Hancock impersonates Gettysburg.

Gen. Butterfield for Hancock.

A New York Sun reporter met Gen. Butterfield and asked him if it was true that he had come out for Hancock.

"Yes, sir, it is."

"And are you going to take the stump for him?"

"I may."

"It has been denied that you had said you were a Hancock man."

"Yes, I know it has. But I told Mr. Conkling one day, when we were standing on the iron pier, that I was going to vote for Hancock, and he said to me, 'I don't blame you.' I never told anybody about that talk; but it has got out, and I have no reason for wanting it kept a secret. Conkling knows he said it."

Gen. Butterfield was Gen. Meade's Chief of Staff at the battle of Gettysburg, and both he and Gen. Hancock were wounded on that field. Gen. Butterfield was brought up with the New York city militia, and in 1861 led the Twelfth regiment into the field. The Sunday on which that regiment left this city will not be forgotten soon. Gen. Butterfield soon rose to the position of Major General of Volunteers, and, for gallant conduct on several fields of battle, was subsequently advanced by degrees to Brigadier General in the regular army, and Major General by brevet.

"If I knew nothing at all about Gen. Hancock except his conduct at the battle of Gettysburg," said Gen. Butterfield, "that would be enough to cause me to support him as a candidate for any office."

New Trick in Tailoring.

A fashionable Boston tailor has hit upon a plan of gratifying his customers with as many suits of clothes as they may feel inclined to wear at a very large reduction from fashionable prices. He offers to supply three suits a year for $117, four suits for $140, five suits for $162, while for $200 a year he will agree to let them have as many suits as they may choose to wear, the old suits to be returned and the customer to have the privilege of two suits at a time. Under the first three propositions the cost of each suit would be $39,35 and $32,50 respectively, the customer retaining the clothes. Under the last proposition the customer may have ten or more suits a year at a cost of $20 or less for each suit, on the simple condition of exchanging the suits that have been worn for new ones.—New York Evening Post.

The Rothschilds.

The Rothschilds are richer and more powerful than ever. They are men who watch over estate and influence with incessant vigilance. They have not only their own estates and the Bank of France and the Northern Railway at their backs, but they court every man who has the least power, newspaper writer as well as statesman, influential beauty as well as powerful soldier. Their influence is felt in every rank of society, and they foster this influence by assiduous attention.—New Orleans Picayune.

AUBURN, IND., OCTOBER 14, 1880.

Democratic National Ticket.

For President,
GENERAL WINFIELD S. HANCOCK,
of Pennsylvania.

For Vice-President,
WILLIAM H. ENGLISH,
of Indiana.

YELLOW FEVER raging in Havana.

NEW YORK and Kings county will give a combined majority for Hancock of 90,000. This majority will elect the democratic ticket by 50,000 in the state.

THOMAS W. COLERICK, a brother of Hon. Walpole G. Colerick, died at his house in Fort Wayne at two o'clock last Sunday afternoon, with consumption of the bowels.

THE man who is low and dirty enough to sell his vote should be kicked out of a decent community. We regret to believe this of any one, but it is a fact that republican money secured many votes here last Tuesday.

Henry Ward Beecher has just entered upon the thirty-fourth year of his ministrations in Plymouth church. During all these years he has perhaps had a heap of fun. He is not working for the Lord now, but making political speeches for Garfield.

THE success of the fusionists in Maine has induced the democrats and greenbackers of Kansas to turn their attention to the same line of policy, and they have taken steps to put a combination ticket in the field.

A COLORED man kept interrupting Hon. Lyman Trumbull in one of his late speeches. Finally Lyman became [illegible] of it, and turning sharply to the ti[illegible] tatesman, said: "I drafted th[illegible] co[illegible]tional amendment that made cons[illegible]." After that he was not interyou f[illegible] rupt[illegible]

[illegible] speech at Tammany hall, a rec[illegible] [illegible]most said that the Ameri[illegible] Bell[illegible] their prosperity "to the people ow[illegible] Almighty," who has [illegible]ings of th[illegible] [illegible]ed crops with which [illegible] us unboun[illegible]ing masses of Eu[illegible] feed the famish[illegible] rope." The theory [illegible] rough on the resumption shriekers, but it is doubtless the true one.

MR. LUM, secretary of the national greenback committee, boldly makes the charge that Gen. Weaver's expenses in the campaign have been borne by the republicans, and that he is working solely in the interest of that party. Gen. Weaver denies the charges, but Mr. Lum says very emphatically that they can be substantiated.

ONE Mr. Foote, said by republicans to be from Washington City, Indianapolis and several other places, came here last week, so the report goes, to bring money to buy votes for the republican ticket. The votes were bought, and lots of them, too. While driving out Saturday the team ran away and threw him from the buggy, but he was permitted to escape unhurt.

A negro is elected to the legislature of Indiana for the first time in the history of the state. We have to thank the republican party of Indiana for the honor (?). Thus we take one more step in that peculiar phase of progress inaugurated by the republican party. We presume that one of the first steps that the colored brother will take will be similar to that taken by the negro Williams, who was elected to the Ohio legislature last winter, viz: A demand that all barriers to the marriage of whites and blacks should be broken down.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

THE Chicago Inter Ocean is becoming utterly reckless in its utterances. Hear it: "Without the fraud there is no democratic hope. Without a scandalous rejection of the foremost principle of our government, the democratic ticket cannot get the electoral vote of five states in the Union. Is it prudent to take an election by such means, even if the iniquity can be consummated?" It is very evident that the Inter-Ocean has lost all regard for truth, if it ever had any. It could as truthfully have said that no state in the Union was democratic on a fair count, and the wonder is that it did not say it.

MAJOR TRAVIS, the first colored lawyer admitted to the bar of Ohio, died one day this week in Cincinnati. He was styled "The Barrister." The Enquirer says: "Although his knowledge of the law was not very extensive, he was shrewd and cunning. During the war he served as a cook in the gun-boat service, and his title of 'Major' was received in his command of a home company of colored militia. For many years before he espoused the cause of Blackstone, the Major was a barber on Vine street, where the hotel Emery now stands. Before he was seized by the fatal malady he was a man strong in physique and powerful. He has suffered considerably during the past few months. He was about forty years of age, and he leaves a wife and several bright children to mourn his loss. For years past he has been a stand-by of the police court, and it would seem almost as strange to see a session without a judge on the bench as one in which the major did not figure, or at least was not present."

TUESDAY'S WORK!

Over 1,000 Precincts Yet to Hear From.

Mr. Landers Concedes Porter's Election.

The election in Indiana, as far as heard from, is very close. In many counties in the state the democratic loses have been heavy, while in many others they have made large gains. The election will be very close, and both parties are claiming a victory. Mr. Landers concedes the election of Mr. Porter by about 4,000 majority, but as there is still large democratic counties yet to hear from, it is believed that Landers may yet have a small majority. Republicans have a majority in the legislature. The following editorial from the Indianapolis Sentinel is the latest up to our going to press:

"At 5 o'clock this morning there are still over 1,000 voting precincts to hear from. In the 245 reported, the net republican gain is 1,814. The republicans are claiming the state by 5,000 majority, but the returns do not show it, and we hope that when the remaining precincts are heard from, that Mr. Landers' election will be secured by a small majority."

The Journal says: "The returns from the Indiana election come in very slowly. The ticket is very long and most of the precincts in the city large, so that reports received at this hour are confined mainly to the smaller county precincts. Few, if any, of the cities will be heard from for several hours. The returns received indicate steady gains for Porter, which, if continued throughout the state at the same ratio, would elect by about [illegible],000 majority."

DEKALB COUNTY.

The election passed off in Auburn very quietly. At an early hour the citizens began to gather on the streets and work for their favorite candidate. Great interest was shown and good feeling was manifested through the day. The democratic state ticket was carried in the county though a large sum of money was used by republicans to buy votes. The democratic county ticket was elected, except sheriff, which was defeated by 92 votes. Colerick's majority in the county was 185, and S. S. Shutt for joint representative was 835. We will publish the returns in full next week.

THIS CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT.

Hon. Walpole G. Colerick, democratic candidate for congress, has been elected, without any doubt, by at least 700 majority.

Gen. Jas. R. Slack, democratic candidate for congress in the eleventh district, has been defeated, and Steele, of Marion, elected. The majority is small.

CLARK COUNTY.

ADAMS COUNTY.

DECATUR, Oct. 13.—At a low estimate the democratic majority in this county is thirteen hundred. There are democratic gains in each township.

WELLS COUNTY.

BLUFFTON, Oct. 13.—The democratic majority in Wells county is 856.

FLOYD COUNTY.

NEW ALBANY, Oct. 13.—The election absorbed all interest. The vote is the heaviest ever cast in the city, and the country precincts are expected to show an increased vote. The day passed quietly, only two small local fights. Landers will not have over 400 majority in the county.

DEARBORN COUNTY.

Edward Jackson, democrat, for county representative, and Jacob L. Bentham, democrats, for joint representative, are elected. Republican gains are reported.

CLARKE COUNTY.

JEFFERSONVILLE, Ind., Oct. 13.—Gibson, democrat, is undoubtedly elected to the legislature over Ruff by a small majority. Only one precinct heard from, which gives eighty-six democratic majority. The democratic majority in the county will be considerably reduced.

A DEMOCRATIC GAIN AT EVANSVILLE.

EVANSVILLE, Oct. 13.—Armstrong township gives a majority of 206 to the state ticket. Hazelton precinct gives Landers 75 majority, a democratic gain of 28.

TERRE HAUTE, Ind., Oct. 13.—Pierson township, this county, gives Landers 53 majority, and a democratic gain of 3 over the vote of 1876. The sixth ward gives Porter nine majority a republican gain of 41 over the vote of 1876.

WHITLEY COUNTY.

R. C. Bell runs thirty votes ahead of the regular democratic majority in Whitley county.

ALLEN COUNTY.

In Allen county sufficient returns have been received to know that the entire democratic ticket has been elected by good round majorities, yet at the present time it is impossible to give the precise figures, as some of the outlaying districts are yet to be heard from. The democratic majority in the city has been decreased. The republican gain in this county as far as heard from is 810.

The Result in Ohio.

In Ohio the republicans, contrary to the expectations of the democrats, have made a tolerably clean sweep. Hamilton county, which the democrats thought they would carry, is republican, and both the democratic candidates for congress are defeated. Heavy democratic gains are reported in some localities, particularly in Cuyahoga county, and more may appear in time, but there is at present no reason to doubt that the republicans will have an old-time majority in the state.

The Chicago Times says that negroes in large numbers from Covington and other cities in Kentucky voted under the protection of the republican officials, who controlled every part of the election machinery. In some instances these fellows, armed with clubs, marched to the polls in crowds and threatened bodily injury to any person presuming to challenge them. Several deputy sheriffs who arrested repeaters known to be republicans were themselves arrested by the city police and their prisoners liberated. Intense excitement prevailed in the city all day, but no violence is reported.

COLUMBUS, Oct. 13.—All efforts thus far to obtain definite majorities by counties has failed. The republican county commissioners evidently feeling that inasmuch as Ohio has gone republican, there is but little interest felt in the exact figures. The democratic state committee refuse all attempts at interviews by newspaper correspondents saying: They know the state has gone republican and that republicans have swept every doubtful congressional district and that is quite enough for them to know.

HAMILTON COUNTY, OHIO.

CINCINNATI, Oct. 13.—Complete returns from Hamilton county, except three precincts, give Townsend (republican), secretary of state, a majority of 2,637; McIlvaine, judge of the supreme court, republican, 3,210; Bailey, republican, sheriff, 3,724; Capeller, county auditor, republican, 4,501; Outcolt, prosecuting attorney, republican, 4,828. Three precincts to hear from gave a democratic majority last year. Comparing the vote for judge of the supreme court with that of governor last year, this would show a democratic gain in the county of 787. Butterworth's majority, republican, first district, will be 1,2[illegible]0; Young, republican, second district, about the same.

COLUMBUS, O., Oct. 13, 1 a. m.—The democratic headquarters are nearly deserted. A request for an opinion as to how the state had gone was refused to an associated press reporter on the ground that the committee had no opinion to give any one, that their figures were too meager to warrant them in giving an opinion, except that the state had gone republican. They only claim the election of six congressmen: McMahon, in the fourth district; Lefevre, in the fifth; Leedon, in the seventh; Converse, in the twelfth; Atherton, in the thirteenth, and Geddes, in the fourteenth. They hope, however, to elect Hurd in the sixth and Warner in the fifteenth with possible chances of electing Shaffer in the tenth district.

TOLEDO, Oct. 13.—The city complete gives Ritchie, republican candidate for congress, 124 majority. Democrats concede his election over Hurd by 300; republicans claim 600; the county gives 400 republican majority.

COLUMBUS, Oct. 13, 2 a. m.—The best information at this hour is that the republicans have elected 13 congressmen.

Republican Work.

Sheriff McCorkle, of Shelbyville, Shelby county, Ind., was brutally shot down last Saturday by a republican while trying to preserve the peace. The Indianapolis Sentinel pays this deserved tribute to him: "Albert McCorkle was an officer of the law, clothed with great responsibilities, which he never failed to recognize in the discharge of his official duties. He performed lawful acts in a lawful manner. He was courteous, generous, kind and faithful. He felt in the discharge of the high trusts conferred upon him by his fellow-citizens. He died a martyr to duty. When such men fall victims to partisan bullets, the great public heart beats like a muffled drum. The state feels the blow—the law is defied and society outraged. Why was Albert McCorkle, the high sheriff of Shelby county, assassinated? Why does he lie dead in his bloody shroud in his darkened home? Why does his wife and children sit silent and bowed, while their hearts are in the coffin with a dead husband and father? There is but one reply: Because he was a democratic official in the discharge of his duty, and therefore the victim of fierce, implacable, partisan hate. Society mourns to-day with McCorkle's relatives and neighbors, and the Sentinel in draping its columns in mourning but inadequately expresses its profound sympathy for the bereaved, and its unmitigated abhorrence of the atrocious spirit which the republican party has sought to inject into the campaign.

A Terrible Arraignment.

Mr. Groesbeck, one of the most eminent lawyers of Ohio, in a recent speech in Cincinnati, arraigns Gen. Garfield for the part he took in making up a case in Louisiana as a lawyer for the republicans, and afterwards sitting upon and deciding it as a judge, at Washington. A more serious charge could not be made against any one. The following is an extract from Mr. Groesbeck's very able speech: "How unfortunate that General Garfield went to Louisiana! His mere presence was a participation in the contest, and by his mere presence without referring to what he did, he encouraged and helped to arrange a case for his party, and, having done this, he returned to Washington and sat as one of the judges to decide it. The majority of every vote of the electoral commission was just one. His was that vote, and all the responsibility of deciding a case which he helped to prepare rests upon him."

That Flag.

The republicans have made a great deal of capital out of the mistake of the Hot Springs (Ark.) Telegraph, which lately put up a confederate flag instead of the starry banner. It was to no purpose that Mr. Webber, the editor, explained the mistake and protested his loyalty to the Union—to no purpose that he denounced the attempt of stalwart politician to fire the northern heart upon the mistake of a printer. It was all unavailing. The little flag had been photo-lithographed, and will be made to do duty until the end of the campaign. A recent issue of the Ft. Wayne Daily News contained a cut of that flag, with an article distorting the facts in the case. The editor of that sheet would not publish Mr. Webber's statement of the matter, which he knows to be the fact, except under the head of "advertisement," paid for at the rate of about 10 or 20 cents a line.

FELIX MCGOWAN, a hotel keeper residing in the city of New York, has been made exceedingly uncomfortable from the fact that his hotel is numbered 329, and has petitioned the board of aldermen to have the number changed. In his petition McGowan sets forth, among others, the following reasons for desiring to have the number of his hotel changed: "People go by and jeer at the sign on which it is inscribed. Customers and travelers refuse to come in, because they say it is an unlucky and fatal number. Boys place their thumbs in odd abutments to their noses and whirl defiance at the number with their fingers. Some irreverent parties have even insulted complainant and petitioner by calling out, 'holloo, old Garfield, give us a divvy!' or else 'what are your aims, old DeGolyer?' so that life is becoming a grevious burden to your petitioner."

"Wherefore, he prays your honorable body to change the number of his premises to 328½ or 328¾, inasmuch as he is convinced that 329 will always be a reproach to him and his premises."

No. 329 will in the future be odious—suggestive of bribes, false oaths and republicanism generally.

THEY call 'em "floppers" in Pennsylvania. They are all flopping over from Garfield to Hancock. Think of a mass-meeting of several thousand republicans with a president and one hundred and fifty vice-presidents, and four or five of the most eminent speakers in the country—all republicans—advocating and working for Hancock and English! This actually took place one night recently at Pittsburgh.

Kellogg's Columbian Oil is a powerful remedy, which can be taken internally as well as externally by the tenderest infant. It cures almost instantly, is pleasant, acting directly upon the nervous system, causing a sudden buoyancy of the mind. In short, the wonderful effects of this most wonderful remedy cannot be explained in written language. A single dose inhaled and taken according to directions will convince any one that it is all that is claimed for it. Warranted to cure the following diseases: Rheumatism or Kidney Disease in any form, Headache, Toothache, Earache, Neuralgia, Sprains, Bruises, Flesh Wounds, Bunions, Burns, Corns, Spinal Affection, Colic, Cramping Pains, Cholera Morbus, Flux, Diarrhœa, Coughs, Colds, Bronchial Affection, Catarrh, and all aches and pains, external or internal. —Fred. Davis spent last Sunday in Wabash.

—Rev. J. Norris will spend a few days at Indianapolis this week.

—Miss Effie Wunderlich returned to her home in Columbia City last Thursday.

—Found, a nickel, which the owner can have by calling and paying for this notice.

—Mrs. James Pierce has been quite ill for some time, but is improving slowly.

—Mrs. Picker returned from Columbia City last Monday, where she has been visiting.

—"Money makes the mare go;" also it made votes for the republicans in this county.

—Sheriff Leas was not very "solid" in Garrett, getting only nine votes out of the shops.

—The mush-and-milk social at the Presbyterian church last evening was well attended.

—John Roskopf, formerly an employe in Sam. Pommert's barber-shop, was on the streets last Friday.

—Andrew Camp will have a sale of personal property, on the Neidig farm, Friday, October 22, 1880.

—The old adage that "money is the root of all evil," was well demonstrated in this county last Tuesday.

—Miss E. Lillian Morse, of Angola, spent several days in Auburn last week, the guest of Mrs W. J. Austin.

—Mrs. Dr. Wickweir, of Angola, has been here the past week visiting her sister, Miss M Cleveland.

—The foundation of Mich. Houston's new building has been laid, and the structure is rapidly taking shape.

—The time to "suck cider through a straw" has arrived, which has increased the sale of peppermint and hot drinks.

—Mr. James Fristoe and wife, of Decatur, Ind., were visitors at Dr. T. G. Matheny's the forepart of the week.

—Miss Alice McKay has her new quarters tastefully arranged, and will always be pleased to have her friends call.

—Mr. Louis Tess collided with a vehicle during the demonstration at Garrett last Saturday night, and was badly hurt.

—Fred. April has the rebellion "nearly down." He thinks he will accomplish it before the presidential election.

—If you want to see the coziest establishment in town, just step up to Miss Alice McKay's, over Mrs. Jones' notion store.

—New styles cloakings and cloaks, new repellants and ladies' cloth, new all-wool dress plaids, [at McQuiston & Ralston's. 42-3w.

—Dawson Foshey, a brother of our pleasant operator, William, returned to the city Tuesday after quite an extended visit at Winchester, this state.

—Wm. Showalter, formerly of this city, but now of Fremont, came down to see us Tuesday and dropped his mite in favor of Van Auken. No good, though.

—Hank Altenburg got a respite from his duties as mail clerk, and came home Tuesday to deposit his ballot. It is suspicioned that he voted the republican ticket.

—We learn there is a gentleman in the city desirous of giving our band instructions. Brace up, boys, and grasp opportunity.

—For fifty years Sellers' liver pills have brought health and happiness in thousands of homes. Ask your druggist for them.

—Mr. M. Seiler, formerly teacher here, has accepted a position in the schools of Lafayette, Ind., at a salary of $1,800 a year.

—Kahn & Co., of Waterloo, have a new advertisement in this issue. Gaze upon it, and don't forget where they keep when you want bargains.

—We learn that W. E. Eldridge, better known as Pete, has finished his course in railroad business at Janesville, Wis., and has accepted a position on the road.

—Our candidate for sheriff, Mr. Jay J. Van Auken, made a good fight, and proved a man of strength before the people, but there was too much money used against him.

—Isn't it about time for the B. & O. road to have another smash-up in this neighborhood? It has been as much as two weeks since we have heard of any such disasters on that road.

—Mr. Brinkerhoff came up to the polls Tuesday for the first time in fifteen years. He voted for the republican ticket, however, but will support Hancock in the presidential election.

—It is said that a girl who can shed three or four tears at a critical moment and follow them up with a quivering sigh, can marry all around a good-looking blonde who does nothing but try to blush.

—W. H. Dills informs us that preparatory to re-entering the practice of his profession, he has engaged a new and eligible room for an office on Main street, where he expects to be found on and after Nov. 1 next. tf.

—The Waterloo fair closed last Saturday. Notwithstanding the political commotion in the land, which has interfered with fairs elsewhere, the Waterloo fair was largely attended, and a good showing made.

—Cast your eye over the COURIER this week and notice the new advertisement of McQuiston and Ralston. It will be found on the fourth page, and every person should read it before purchasing anything in their line.

—Mr. Isaac Ochs' new store, opposite the postoffice is a booming. He is an enterprising, clever gentleman, and will treat you kindly and sell you goods at bed-rock prices. Go and see his mammoth stock of goods.

—T. C. Ford, who for some time past has been in the livery business at Waterloo, removed his family to this city last Wednesday. Cook is a good business man, and we welcome him back to the place of his birth.

—The Texas clergyman about to become chaplain of a penitentiary, preached a farewell sermon to his congregation who had all mistreated him, from the following text: "I go to prepare a place for you, so that where I am, ye may be also."

—Mr. Mat Zervis and wife, of Waterloo, were thrown from a buggy at the Jackson depot, in Auburn, Saturday. The horses became scared at an approaching train and upset the buggy, though they were not hurt, and but little damage was done.

—The mystic figures, "329," like the handwriting on the wall, have all of a sudden loomed up on our pavements and door-steps. Nobody seems to care for it except our republican friends, who appear offended, and evidently know just what it means.

—Some rural chap from St. Joe, filled his skin with Garrett's fighting whisky, Saturday night at the above-named place, and swore he could whip any man who wore hair. From the looks of his proboscis he must have come in contact with a bald-headed individual.

—Our worthy representative elect, Mr. D. D. Moody, is a big-hearted gentleman, a proof of which is, that last week he presented the COURIER office with a box of fine cigars, which just exactly touched the spot. We hope we may have an opportunity to vote for Mr. Moody some more.

—Lost, last Saturday at Waterloo, a pocket-book containing considerable money and a letter from Story & Camp, of Chicago. Five dollars reward will be paid if the pocket-book, or any information which will lead to its recovery, is left at Long's hotel, in Waterloo.

—Last Wednesday morning Mr. James Quince, of Corunna, in a conversation impolitely remarked to Mr. Jay J. Van Auken that he had strayed from the truth, when the latter gentleman raised Mr. Quince off of the pavement on the toe of his boot. Only that and nothing more.

—Certain republicans tried very hard to get one of the democratic tickets that were being printed here the later part of last week, in order that they might "fix up" a ticket for democrats to vote. As high as twenty dollars is said to have been offered for a single slip, but the young man to whom the offer was made was too manly for such dirty work. He did, however, try to sell them one of last year's tickets, but they smelt a mice.

HE WAS A STRANGER, AND THEY TOOK HIM IN.

A Tramp Burglarized Groscop's Saloon in Broad Daylight.

When Jehovah started man out in business for himself, it was decreed that he should obtain provender by the sweat of his brow. This curse has never been suspended, we are sorry to say, and he who tries to run around it, will surely come to grief. This is the case with Albert Conode, who, it is probable, judging from his general appearance, has never read the sacred law bearing on this point, and would not know a bible from one of Dr. McLean's vermifuge advertisements. Albert was peripatetic in his habits, and belonged to that numerous class of poor but dishonest men known as tramps. He struck Auburn last Thursday, weary and foot-sore and with a distressing sense of emptiness in the abdominal regions that demanded immediate attention. He didn't go to a hotel, but watched his chance, and when Mr. Groscop went to dinner last Thursday, entered his saloon by removing a pane of glass in a window in the rear end of the building. Albert got fifty or sixty checks, good for five cents at the bar, and four or five dollars in money. The disposal of the checks led to the arrest, and he is now in jail awaiting action in the case.

Butler Township.

—Democrats are plenty in this vicinity.

—The republicans had a great rally at Butler Center last Friday evening. There were eighteen republicans and nine democrats present.

—The majority of the citizens of this township, were pleased with the rally at Garrett last Saturday evening, because they think it was an indication of a change in official affairs.

—Several young ladies, who adhere very strongly to the principles of the stalwarts, went to Garrett last Saturday evening, and while there publicly made use of very vulgar languge, degrading to themselves, to the ladies who accompanied them from this place, and whose reputations are untarnished. They should bear in mind that politeness is the foundation of character, and take their mothers with them until they learn how to conuct themselves with decency.

AN OBSERVER.

Dying Words.

It is probably natural that at the last the scenes which have made the strongest impressions in life should be recalled by memory. The old mountaineer, when he comes to die, with his last whisper says his snow-shoes are lost; with a stage-driver he is "on a down grade and cannot reach the break;" the miner cannot get to the air-pipe; the sailor says "eight bells have sounded," and the gambler plays his last trump. A little girl died a few years ago and as her mother held her wrist and noted the fainting and flickering pulse, a smile came to the wan face, and the child whispered: "There's no more desert here, mamma, but all the world is full of beautiful flowers." A moment later, the smile became transfixed. In an eastern city not long ago, a sister of charity was dying, and from a stupor she opened her eyes and said: "It is strange; every kind word that I have spoken in life, every tear that I have shed, has become a living flower around me, and they bring to my senses an incense ineffable."

Making a Belle.

It is certain that in American society, says a newspaper, the men make the belles. A case in point occurred a few years ago in Newport, when several young men, then well known in society, determined to try the experiment. They selected a charming young woman, bright enough to please in conversation, but not remarkable for beauty nor quite within the charmed circle of society. For days they took it in turn to dance with her, to drive her out and to display all the devotion necessary to make her agreeably conspicuous. The object of these attentions was as much surprised as she was flattered. In a short time the leaders of fashion called on her. She was a belle.

—Several "loyal" gentlemen from Cedarville, Allen county, eighteen in number, came over into DeKalb county, some time since, to cut a pole, to be erected at the above-named place in honor of Garfield and Arthur. After succeeding in getting the tamarac, the rads. procured some hand-spikes of sumach with which to carry the pole from the swamp. In their efforts they became somewhat overheated and perspired quite freely, and using their palms to wipe the sweat from their brows, the whole party was badly poisoned, and when they reached Cedarville their faces were so badly swollen that they could not see the pole.

—Music has charms to soothe the savage breast, and good news has potency to heal the sufferings of the afflicted. For instance, our agent of the Wabash railroad was nearly helpless with rheumatism, but was suddenly "all right" when the words reached him by wire, "Your wife and daughter are on the three o'clock train." Presto change, and the lame walk. Mrs. Johnson, after a visit of several months in Pennsylvania, returned last Saturday.

Neighborhood Nippings.

Charles Emerick, of Whitley county, died last Sunday morning, aged 68 years. He was for many years a resident of Allen county, and was widely known.

The Wabash Courier speaking of the editor of the Plain Dealer, compliments him in this emphatic language: "It's chief editor, T. P. Keater, is a liar who possesses less conscience but far more originality than Ananias of old. He is so utterly corrupt that he lies when the truth would serve him much better." It would probably be more satisfactory to the readers of those two journals if the editors would settle their difficulties with shot-guns, and quit filling their papers with articles both discourteous and disgusting.

The hardware store of Lessel Long, at Antioch, was entered by burglars Sunday night. The safe was blown open and about $1,000 in money was taken, besides a lot of valuable papers, razors and pocket-knives. No clew.

Mr. John George Aichele, of Kendallville, died Oct. 6, aged 55 years. He came to Kendallville in 1857, and has been engaged in the marble business.

Rev. J. O. Fisher, pastor of the Baptist church died at his home in Kendallville, Oct. 6, aged 66 years.

A most shocking tragedy was enacted in Warsaw, Tuesday, Sept. 28. Gun L. Smith, agent of the Singer sewing machine at that place, killed his paramour and then put an end to his own existence. He left the following letter with his attorney:

WARSAW, IND., Sept. 28, 1880.

TO A. G. WOOD:

I shall this day settle this matter of ours so that you will have no more trouble. [Here follows some abuse which is not necessary to publish.] I am as innocent of the crime charged to me as a child, or you or any other person. I went with Miss Chaplin for purposes, (too obscene for publication) and nothing more, as God is my judge, and never did I get anything else, or more. I propose to let, as the good christians say, "a just God decide," and if he is just, He will damn a few of the professed good ones of this place. I say before God that I am innocent of all the charges preferred against me by the low hounds and a prostitute of this town. I wish you to show this to them, and see that I am decently interred, and say I damn and curse them all with my dying breath. My wife and babes are good, true, and innocent, as I myself am, with the exception of what liquor I have drank. * * * * Now, will you and Mr. Briggs please settle all, and do for the wife and babes the best you can, as brother Odd-Fellows. I am sorry this must be done, but all are against me, and I must do the best I can. Ever yours fraternally,

G. L. SMITH.

A man named John Hicks, 80 years of age, has just been received at the Jeffersonville, Ind., penitentiary, on a two years' sentence. He has passed 50 years of his long life in prison.

George Weisenberger, a saloon keeper of Ft. Wayne, was attacked Sunday by three boys to whom he refused to sell liquor, and was injured to such an extent that his life is despaired of.

Last week Wednesday night about 11 o'clock a barn on the farm of Tom Wickwire, about five miles northwest of Angola, was burned to the ground together with its contents. The origin of the fire is unknown. There was an insurance of about $400 on the barn and the contents consisting of several tons of hay, rye, etc., were also insured.

County Clerk Goodale, while overhauling the papers of his office a few days ago, came across copies of the Indiana State Sentinel, published by G. A. and J. P. Chapman in 1845—6. In the weekly issue dated Aug. 21, 1845, under the heading of "Postscript," appears the following item: "WAR DECLARED. We learn by a postscript just received, that Mexico has declared war against the United States. Don Quixote against the Windmills! Ho! for the Calafornias!"

Last Saturday, the democrats raised a row down at Shelbyville on the occasion of a republican rally at that place. Before the affair ended the rebel pluguglies and repeaters got the worst of it. McCorkle, the democratic sheriff, who was urging the crowd on to deeds of violence, was mortally wounded and died Sunday.—Steuben Republican.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

Since the introduction of Kellogg's Columbian Oil, it has made more permanent cures and given better satisfaction on kidney complaints and rheumatism than any known remedy. Its continued series of wonderful cures, in all climates, has made it known as a safe and reliable agent to employ against all aches and pains, which are the forerunners of more serious disorders. It acts speedily and surely, always relieving suffering and often saving life. The protection it affords by its timely use on rheumatism, kidney affection; and all aches and pains, wounds, cramping pains, cholera morbus diarrhoea, coughs, colds, catarrh, and disorders among children, makes it an invaluable remedy to be kept always on hand in every home. No person can afford to be without it, and those who have once used it never will. It is also lately certain in its remedial effects, and will always cure when cures are possible. Call at Casebeer & Matheny's and get a memorandum book giving more full details of the curative properties of this wonderful medicine. 34-1y

LOVE'S REPENTANCE.

Love came knocking, gently knocking
At the portals of my heart,
And besought me their unlocking,
For a secret he'd impart;
But I laughed to scorn his greeting—
And regretted not the fleeting
Of his baffled steps retreating
On their way.

Then again a message brought he,
Knocking gently as before,
And with courtly tones besought me—
Yet I opened not the door.
Mildly chiding my denying,
And my cool reserve decrying,
He, with low and mystic sighing,
Turned away.

Soon the little tyrant shyly—
Without warning as before—
Pulled the latch-string, and then slyly
Pushed aside the loosened door.
Though my heart was near relenting,
And I felt 'twould bring repenting,
Yet I would not, by consenting,
Love to-day.

Could I catch him and securely
Tie his little wicked wings,
I would kneel to him demurely,
Tho' I know they say he stings—
That is he, I know his knocking,
I will hasten the unlocking.
Ah, the little trifler, mocking,
Flies away!

A LIFE-LESSON.

BY J. W. RILEY.

There! little girl; don't cry!
They have broken your doll, I know,
And your tea-set blue,
And your play-house, too,
Are things of the long ago;
But childish troubles will soon pass by,
There! little girl; don't cry!

There! little girl; don't cry!
They have broken your slate, I know;
And the glad, wild ways
Of your school-girl days
Are things of the long ago;
But life and love will soon come by,
There! little girl; don't cry!

There! little girl; don't cry!
They have broken your heart, I know;
And the rainbow gleams
Of your youthful dreams
Are things of the long ago;
But heaven holds all for which you sigh,
There! little girl; don't cry!

HOW HE GOT OUT OF IT;

OR,

Engaged to Three Girls in One Night.

"If you will take my advice," said Mr. Wilding, making a last noble but futile effort to balance the ivory paper knife on the tip of his first finger, "you won't go to the Brownrigs' ball."

"And why not," asked his companion irritably.

"Well, I really wouldn't, you know," said Mr. Wilding, giving up his struggle with the impossible, and laying the refractory paper knife upon the table, "for a variety of reasons. Girls play the very mischief with you, and you know what trouble it gave me to get you out of your last scrape. There are four Brownrig girls, aren't there? And they are all pretty?"

"I don't see what that's got to do with it," said Snooks, sulkily. "There's safety in a multitude. I can't marry 'em all, can I?"

"Happily, no! Though, if the laws of your land did not forbid it, I am inclined to think you might try to accomplish even that. Still, be advised, Snooks, and be conspicuous by your absence at the Brownrigs' 'small and early.' Papa Brownrig, when incensed, is not nice, and you know you are decidedly intimate with Miss Kate."

"No, I am not," said Snooks with decision, "not a bit of it. Though I allow she is a handsome girl, and has lovely eyes. Hasn't she, now?"

"I don't know. As a rule I never look into a woman's eyes. I consider it a rudeness as well as a beastly," said Wilding earnestly, telling his lie without a blush. "Never mind her eyes. If," warningly, "you must go to this ball, at least try to forget that she has any eyes at all. If you don't, you will propose to her, to a moral."

"One would think that I was a raw school-boy," said young Snooks wrathfully. "Do you think I can't look at a woman without committing myself? Do I look like a fool?"

Whatever Mr. Wilding thought at that moment, he kept it to himself. Before he spoke next, he and his conscience had agreed to dissemble.

"My dear fellow, do not let us even hint at such a thing," he said amiably. "I only meant you were slightly—very slightly—susceptible, and that Miss Kate has a certain amount of pleasing power, and that—I positively would give up this ball if I—"

"Are you going?" broke in Snooks impatiently.

"Well, yes, I dare say I shall look in about 12."

"Then I shall look in with you," said Snooks defiantly.

"Factis, the fellow wants to spoon her himself, and don't see the force of being cut out," said he to himself complacently as he ran down the steps of Wilding's stairs.

Beyond all question the Brownrigs' ball was a decided success. The rooms were filled to overflowing, the staircases were choked, the heat was intorable. Sir Thomas and Lady Higgins had actually put in an appearance after all, and the supper, if uneatable, was, I assure you, very expensive. No pains or money had been spared; everything was what the mistress of the house called "rug regal;" and all the Miss Brownrigs looked as charming as any one could desire.

There were four of them. There was Katie, the second daughter—Snook's friend, and the possessor of the lovely eyes. And they were lovely; large, "and dark, and true, and tender," like the North, according to the Laureate; "black as sloes," said her fond if slightly oppressive mother, and of the languid, melting order.

Then there was Hetty, the eldest girl, who, if her eyes were not dark as midnight, had at least the dearest little nose in the world. A pure Greek feature, perfect in every respect, ignorant of colds in the head, that made one long to tell her (only she would have blushed, they were all nicely brought up) about Dudu, and her Phidian appendage.

Then came Georgie—"George the Third," as she was playfully termed in the bosom of her family—who, if she had neither nose nor eyes like her sisters, had certainly a prettier mouth than either. A sweet little kissable rosebud of a mouth that pouted and laughed alternately, and did considerable execution.

And finally, there was Lilly. A tall, pale girl, with blue eyes, a finely cut chin, and a great deal of determination all round.

Katie's eyes were larger, darker, and (when she looked at Snooks and thought of his thousands) more melting than ever that night. Her dress, if slightly bizarre, was immensely becoming. Snooks, for the first half hour, kept himself bravely aloof from her fascinations, declined to notice her reproachful glances and languishing œillades, and for reward was wretched. Finally, being driven into a corner during a fatal set of Lancers, he met her eyes and was conquered. She would dance the next with him? Yes (coldly). And the next? Yes (more gently). And the ninth—he can see she is disengaged for it? Yes (this time quite warmly).

An hour later the deed was done. Some capital champagne, a dark avenue (I believe there were some Chinese lanterns there originally, but a kind wind had blown them out), and a soft little hand slipped into his, did the work; and Miss Katie had promised bashfully, but with unmistakable willingness, to be the future Mrs. Snooks. Whether it was Snooks or the property pertaining to Snooks she most affected, deponent sayeth not.

When, however, her betrothed found what he had done, and remembered his former words, and all the awfulness of parental wrath, his heart failed him. He went, as he usually did when in sorry case, in search of Wilding; and having discovered him, took him into a side room, and shutting the door, confronted him with a rather pale face.

"So the eyes were too many for you?" said Mr. Wilding calmly, after a deliberate examination of the disturbed face before him. "I told you how it would be."

"That's the sort of thing any fellow might say," returned Snooks pathetically. "I didn't think you would have been so aggravating. And just when you see I'm down on my luck, too. Yes; I've been and gone and done it."

"'Mother will be pleased,'" quoted his friend and law adviser with a shrug. "So, by the bye, will be your father. They both regard nothing so highly as birth. I suppose Miss Brownrig can lay claim to some decent breeding?"

"The old chap is a cornchandler, you know that, at least, he used to be," said Snooks, with a heavy groan.

"O, indeed! And a very charming business, too, I have no doubt. Leads up to quite a train of ideas. Corn, wheat, staff of life, quaint old mill, and rustic bridge in the distance, miller sitting on it. I wonder," dreamily, "if Brownrig ever wore a white hat? And if so, why? Don't all speak at once. Well, well, she is a very pretty girl. Such eyes, you know! I really congratulate you, my dear fellow."

"Wilding," desperately, "can't you do something? I—I don't know how it happened. It was the champagne, I suppose, and of course she is pretty; but I don't want to marry any one, and I know the Governor won't hear of it."

"He will have to hear of it now, won't he?" asked Wilding unfeelingly.

"He would go out of his mind if such a thing was even hinted to him," declared Snooks wildly. "Try to help me out of it, Wilding, can't you?"

"I don't see what there is to do, except marry her. I only hope Lady Snooks and Miss Cornchandler will get on. And you should think of her beauty, you know; doubtless it will console you when Sir Peter cuts you off with the customary shilling."

"I suppose I had better cut my throat and put an end to it," said Snooks dismally; and then, overcome, no doubt, by the melancholy of this suggestion, he breaks down and gives way to tears.

"I say, don't do that, you know," exclaimed Wilding indignantly. "Weeping all over the place won't improve matters, and will make you look a worse fool than nature intended, when you go out of the room. If you have put your foot in it, at least try to bear misfortune like a man. Look here," angrily, "if you are going to keep up this hideous boohooing I'll leave the room, and you too, to your fate. It's downright indecent. They will hear you in the next house if you don't moderate your grief."

As the nearest house was a quarter of a mile off, this was severe.

"I shouldn't care if they heard me in the next town," said Mr. Snooks, who was quite too far gone for shame.

"There is just one chance for you, and only one," said wilding, slowly. "I have an idea and you must either follow it or—go to the altar."

"I'll follow anything, eagerly. What is it?"

"You have proposed to Miss Katie," solemnly. "Now go and propose to the other three!"

As Wilding gave vent to his idea he turned abruptly on his heel and left the room.

"I'll do it," said Snooks valiantly, drying his eyes and giving his breast a tragic tap, "whatever comes of it."

Going into the hall he saw Hetty standing near an entrance; a little way beyond her was Kate, conversing with a tall and lanky youth. Not daring to glance in the direction of the latter, who plainly expected him to come straight to her on the wings of love, he turned and asked Hetty to dance.

They danced, and then (it was custom with the ball goers in that mild suburban neighborhood) he drew her out under the gleaming stars and up the dark avenue that a few minutes since was the scene of her sister's happiness.

There he proposed in due form, and was again accepted. Hetty's conduct, indeed, was perhaps a degree more pronounced than Katie's, because she laid her head upon his shoulder, and he felt by all the laws of sentiment bound to kiss her. Her nose looked lovely in the pale moonlight; so I dare say he did not find the fulfilling of this law difficult.

After that he had some more, a good deal more, champagne; and then he proposed to Miss Georgia, who also consented to be his. There now remained but one other step to be taken. He crossed the room and asked the youngest Miss Brownrig to dance. He was getting rather mixed by this time, and was on the very point of asking her to marry him instead, so customary had the question grown to him now. Miss Lilly, however, declined to dance, on the plea that she was tired, and could exert herself no more that night. With questionable taste he pressed the matter, and begged her to give him just one. At this she told him frankly she did not admire his style of dancing, which, of course, ended the conservation. So he asked her to come for a stroll instead, and having arrived at the momentous spot, delivered himself of the ornate speech that had already done duty three times that night. I forgot what it was, but I know it wound up with the declaration that he adored her and wanted to marry her.

"It's extremely good of you, I'm sure," said the youngest Miss Browning, calmly. "But, uncivil, as I fear it must sound, I don't want to marry you."

"Don't you, by Jove!" said Snook, hastily. "Well, that's awfully ki—No, no!" pulling himself up with a start; "I don't mean that, you know; I mean it's awfully horrid, you know. In fact," warming to his work through sheer gratitude, "you have made me miserable forever; you've broken my heart."

"Dear me, how shocking!" said Miss Lilly, frivolously. "Let us hope Time will mend it. I'm not very sure you did not speak the truth at first. I really believe it is kind, my refusing you. And now, Mr. Snooks, if I were you, I should go in and say good-night to mamma, because you have been having a good deal of papa's champagne, and it is trying to the constitution."

Snooks took the hint, bade farewell to Mrs. Brownrig, who, to his heated imagination, appeared to regard him already with a moist and motherly eye, and, taking Wilding's arm, drew him out of the house.

"Well?" said the latter interrogatively.

"I don't know whether it is well or ill," returned he gloomily. "But I followed your advice and proposed to 'em all."

"And they accepted you?"

"Most of 'em. But Lilly, the youngest, she—"

"I always said she was a sensible girl," put in Mr. Wilding, sotto voce.

"Did you?" with much surprise. "Well, she refused me; sort of said she wouldn't have me at any price. So you see you were wrong!"

"I always knew she was one of the most intelligent girls I ever met," Mr. Wilding repeated, in a tone so difficult that his companion for once had sufficient sense to refrain for demanding an explanation.

The next morning, as Katie Brownrig turned the angle of the hall that led to her father's sanctum (whither a sense of filial duty beckoned her) she almost ran into the arms of her three sisters, all converging toward the same spot from different directions. Simultaneously they entered Mr. Brownrig's study. (He called it a library; but that word is too often profaned for me to profane it, so I shall draw the line at study). But to return. Miss Lilly, being the youngest, was of course the first to raise her voice.

"I had a proposal last night, papa, and I have come to tell you about it," said she, in a tone replete with triumph.

It was so sweet to the mind of youth to outdo its elders. But "on this occasion only" the elders refused to be outdone. They each and all betrayed a smile of inward satisfaction, and then they gave way to speech.

"No!" they said in a breath. They; did not mean to doubt or be impolite they only meant surprise.

"The curate," said Hetty in a composed but plainly contemptuous whisper. It was a stage whisper.

"Old Major Sterne," said Miss Georgie promptly.

"Perhaps Henry Simms," suggested Katie, with some sympathy. Then turning to her father she said, with a conscious blush, "It is very strange, papa, but I too had a proposal last night."

"And so had I!" exclaimed Georgie and Hetty in a breath.

"Eh?" said papa, pushing up his spectacles. He was fat and pudgy, with sandy hair and flabby nose. He was a powerful man, too, and one unpleasant to come to open quarrel with. Proposals in the Brownrig family were few and far between—in fact, curiosities—and so much luck as the girls described falling into one day overpowered him.

"One at a time; my breath is not what it used to be," he said addressing Katie. (If he had said breadth, it would have been equally true, as his mother—if she was to be believed—always declared he was a lean baby). "May I ask the name of your lover?"

"Mr. Snooks," said she with downcast eyes and a timid smile. She took up the corner of a cherry-colored bow that adorned her gown, and fell to admiring it, through which she fondly thought was bashfulness.

"Impossible!" exclaimed Georgie angrily.

"What a disgraceful untruth!" cried Hetty rudely. "Mr. Snooks proposed to me, last night, and I accepted him."

"What is it you say? Oh, I am going out of my mind; my senses are deserting me," said Georgie, putting her hands to her head with a dramatic gesture. "Or is it a dream that he asked me to marry him, and that I too said 'yes'?"

"I seldom visit the clouds," said Lilly, with a short but bitter laugh. "And I certainly know he made me a a noble offer of his hand and heart; both which treasures I declined."

"Where?" demanded the other three, as though with one mouth.

"In the laurel avenue!"

At this they all groaned aloud.

"Perfidious monster!" said Hetty from her heart.

"Am I to understand," began Mr. Brownrig, with suppressed but evident fury, "that this—this—unmitigated scoundrel asked you all to marry him last night?"

"If we speak the truth, yes," replied the girls dismally.

"He was drunk," said papa, savagely.

"I can't believe it," said Katie, who was dissolved in tears—in fact, 'like Niobe, all tears'—by this time. "Nothing could be nicer than the way he did it. His language was so perfect, and so thoroughly from the—heart."

"He addressed me in a most honorable, upright, and Christian fashion," said Hetty. "I am sure he meant every word he said."

She was thinking uneasily of that kiss in the moonlight. Could anyone have seen her? Was old Major Sterne anywhere about at the moment?

"I certainly considered his manner strange, not a bit like what one reads," said Georgia, honestly, "but I thought of the title and the property, and I said yes directly."

"I thought him the very greatest muff I ever spoke to," broke in Miss Lilly with decision: I refused him without a moment's hesitation, and told him to go home. I'm sure it was well I did. I daresay if he had stayed here much longer he would have proposed to mamma next, and afterward to the upper housemaid. I agree with you, papa, the champagne was too much for him."

"I—I think he is fond of me," said Katie, in a low and trembling tone. Her fingers are not playing with the cherry colored bow now, but her eyelids have borrowed largely of its tint.

"Don't be a goose, Katie," said the youngest Miss Brownrig, kindly, but scornfully; "you don't suppose any of us would marry him now, after the way he has behaved? Do have some little pride."

"Perhaps he is mad," said Hetty, vaguely. Just at this moment, as a slave to her wounded vanity, she would have been glad to believe him so.

"No, my dear," declared Lily, calmly; "he has no brains worth turning."

"He said something to papa about calling to-day at 4 o'clock," said Katie, very faintly.

"Then I shall sit here till 4," returned Mr. Brownrig in an awful tone. "I shall set here until 5; and then I shall get up, and go out and find that young man, and give him such a horse whipping as I warrant you he never got before in all his life."

"I shan't my dear, but my whip will," said papa, grimly.

So he waited until 5; he waited until half-past five; and then he took up a certain heavy gold knobbed whip that lay stretched on the table as though in readiness, and sallied forth in search of Snooks' rooms. And he found them, and Snooks, too—in bed, suffering from a severe catarrh, caught, I presume, in the laurel avenue.

And no man knows what he did to Snooks. But at least he gave him an increased desire for his bed, because for a fortnight afterward he never stired out of it.

When Mr. Wilding heard of all this, I regret to say he gave way to noisy mirth in the privacy of his chambers; and was actually caught by his washerwoman, who peeped through the keyhole, performing a wild dance in the middle of the floor.

Germany's Financial Troubles.

The condition of German finance is one of the curses of the unhappy Fatherland. The number of finance ministers Germany and Prussia have had since the glorious period when German unity was consummated cannot well be counted on the fingers of one hand. Prince Bismarck has his ideas of finance; but his unfortunate ministers have generally had opinions which differed from his. In order to discover additional means of increasing the revenue, the financial heads of the various States are now sitting at Coburg. It has become evident that the protective tariff does not supply the requisite amount, but by hook or crook the German revenue must be augmented. That is the burden of the song which this conference must sing. Prince Bismarck proposes more indirect taxes, such as a heavier malt tax, a tobacco monopoly, and additional stamp duties. He quite admits that the direct levies are already as great as they can be endured; while the injustice in the incidence of indirect taxation is loudly complained of by writers in the German press and by the army of professors. If the military competiton between France and Germany continues much longer it is not difficult to foretell where the victory will lie.—London Examiner.

A Satisfactory Candidate for Life Insurance.

Josh Billings says: "I kum to the conclusion lately that life was so onsartin that the only wa for me tu stand a fair chance with other folks was tu git my life insured, and so i kalled on the Agent of the Garden Angel Life Insurance Co., and answered the following questions, which was put tu me over the top ov a pair ov goold specks, by a slik little fat old feller, with a little round grey head, and as pretty a little belly on him as enny man ever owned: Questions—1st. Are you mail or femail? If so, pleze state how long you have been so. 2d. Are you subject to fits, and if so, do yu have more than one at a time? 3d. Did yu ever have enny ancestors, and if so, how much? 4th. Du yu ever have enny nite mares? 5th. Are yu married and single, or are yu a bachelor? 6th. Do yu believe in a future state? If yu do, state it. 7th. Have yu ever committed suicide, and if so, how did it seem to affect yu? After answering the above questions, like a man, in the confirmotif, the slik little fat old feller with goold specks on ced I was insured for life, and proberly would remain so for a term ov years. I thanked him, and smiled one ov my most pensive smiles."

They Say.

That coquetry is a continued lie, which renders a woman more contemptible and more dangerous than a courtesan who never lies.

That before promising a woman to love only her, one should have seen them all, or see only her.

That real love has no age; it is always in birth.

That it is a terrible thing to be obliged to love by contract.

That one expresses well only to love which is not felt.

That you can trust your dog to the end; a woman—till the first opportunity.

That of all heavy bodies, the heaviest is the woman that we have ceased to love.

That a woman who pretends to laugh at love, is like the child who sings at night when he is afraid.

That rivals who blow out each other's brains for the eyes of any woman, prove that they have no brains.

That love pleases more than marriage, for the reason that romance is more pleasing than history.

That the highest mark of esteem a woman can give to a man is to ask his friendship; and the most signal proof of her indifference is to offer him hers.—Indianapolis Herald.

CANADA consumes annually 120,000 cords of bark at home, and 161,374 cords are exported. It is authoritatively stated that 1,250,000 trees are already cut, and that fifteen years more of the vandalism, i. e., destroying trees and not replanting, will wipe out the hemlock forest entirely. Canada is thus killing the goose that the United States should "cherish."

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE Spanish Armada numbered 130 ships, to which the English could oppose but eighty vessels, and these so small that four of them only equaled in tonnage the smallest of the galleons. The Armada carried 8,000 seamen and 20,000 soldiers. The English fleet was manned by 8,000 sailors.

NUTMEGS grow upon a tree from twenty-five to thirty feet high, which bears a fruit resembling in form and size the seckle pear. When ripe the outer shell of this fruit breaks, revealing an inner case of bright red, known to commerce as mace. This in its turn is removed, and the nutmeg is found inclosed in a third shell harder than either of the others.

THE Parsees of India are fire-worshipers, and reverence the sun, moon and stars. Upon the altars of their temples the priests keep fire continually burning, and declare that it has never been extinguished. When engaged in their duties these devotees wear masks over the lower part of their faces, lest their breath should pollute the sacred flame.

CONDUCTING the British Government by a Ministry chosen from the strongest party in the House of Commons dates from the time of William III., in 1689. Previous to that all the Ministers had been independent of each other, and responsible to the sovereign alone, who might dismiss one great officer of state and retain the rest. The idea of a homogeneous Ministry was first carried out by Robert, Earl of Sunderland, who successively held office under Charles II., James II. and William of Orange.

THE needle-gun is the invention of John Nicholas Dreyse, a Prussian locksmith. He was 19 years old when the battle of Jena was fought, and picked up a musket upon the field, an examination of which convinced him that his countrymen were the worst-armed soldiers in Europe. Dreyse made his way to Paris, and entered the employ of a Swiss gunmaker, whom Napoleon commissioned to make a breech-loading musket. The young apprentice took up the idea and worked at it for many years until, in 1835, he succeeded in making a breech-loading needle-gun. The Prussian Government tried and adopted the weapon, and supplied the inventor with means for carrying on the manufacture of the gun now used in Kaiser Wilheim's army.

The Miner's Water-Inch.

A miner's inch of water is a quantity that will flow through an inch aperture with a free discharge and under a constant pressure of six inches above the top of the opening. An aperture 12½x15½ inches under pressure of six inches above the top of the opening will discharge 100 inches, and is the basis of all measurements where water is retailed in small quantities in the States of California and Nevada. A miner's inch will discharge a quantity of water equal to 2,250 cubic feet, or about 17,000 gallons, weighing 139,500 pounds, in twenty-four hours. Water will hold in suspension or solution 1,670 of its entire volume; i. e., an inch of water (miner's inch) having a grade of four inches to the rod, will carry off in twenty-four hours, a distance of ten miles, ten tons of quartz, sand and iron. At one gravel mine in Nevada County, Cal., twenty-four cubic yards, or forty tons of detritus or tailing, as the washed material is called, are moved from three to fifteen miles every twenty-four hours. One hundred miner's inches of water conducted through iron pipes and falling three hundred and fifteen feet, vertically, and applied by means of a nozzle against a hurdy-gurdy wheel sixteen feet in diameter, will furnish sufficient power to run an eight-stamp mill, besides carrying off all the ore which it has furnished the power to crush.—San Francisco Post.

Hiding Money.

The fact that Spain, though chronologically in the nineteenth century, is really living in the seventeenth, is illustrated by the following from Temple Bar: In old Spanish houses there is generally a very cleverly-contrived secret receptacle for money, akin to the "secret drawer" of the English desk. Even now this secret cupboard is much used, the Spanish idea of security being (an idea founded on bitter experience of many years) to cage the windows in iron bars, lock up the house at night in winter, look at the money, and then say, in security and self-congratulation:

"Why, I am very safe; all I love and all I need is contained within the four walls of my casa.

There is a vast deal of distrust of banks and government securities, and a great holding to the proverb, "No friend save God, and a dollar in your pocket." And now with the middle class there is no banking of money.

The bankers, to begin with, give no interest, as a rule; and so, just as in Scotland, in the troubled year of 1650, the goldsmiths were the only bankers, so now, in Spain, the gentry constantly hoard their money in their own houses; some put their jewelry and plate in the montes de piedad.

Double and Twisted.

A laughable circumstance once took place upon a trial in Lancashire, where the Rev. Mr. Wood was examined as a witness. Upon giving his name, Ottiwell Wood, the Judge, addressing the reverend person, said: "Pray, Mr. Wood, how do you spell your name?" The old gentleman replied:

"O double T,
I double U,
E double L,
Double U,
Double O, D."

Upon which the astonished lawyer laid down his pen, saying it was the most extraordinary name he had ever met in his life, and, after two or three attempts, declared he was unable to record it. The court was convulsed with laughter.

HORRIBLE.

Famine Prevailing in the Polar Region

[Story of the Cruise of the Corwin.]

On the second day out from St. Michaels we reached St. Lawrence Island, where it was reported, a famine had swept away nearly the whole population during the previous year. The island is ninety miles long from east to west. We steamed along close in by the shore, working our way through the ice. At last the settlements were reached, and each one that was visited presented the same dreary scene of death and desolation. Not a sign of life was to be seen anywhere. Not a solitary dog or rat was to be found about any of the rude huts; but in front of the houses, in a ghastly row, lay the dead bodies of those who had succumbed to the terrible hunger. They had lain there for fifteen months, and we were probably the first to look upon them. Their clothes had rotted off the bodies, but the forms were preserved by the cold so that they looked like mummies. The skin was drawn tightly over their emaciated faces and forms, and looked like ancient parchment. So perfectly had the dry air preserved them that we could distinguish the bodies of the women from the men by the deep tattoo marks on the chin, which is one of the peculiar styles of feminine ornament. In a few houses bodies were found in various postures, just as they fell in the last agony of solitary death. As long as there were any survivors to perform th service, the corpses were placed in the regular rows in front of the huts. At one place we found fifty bodies side by side, some being the remains of little children, while others were the corpses of old people.

The usual litter and refuse which surround the Esquimaux huts were lacking, and there was not a scrap left of any kind of food. The cleanly-gnawed bones showed that they had eaten their dogs; they had even devoured the rats which infest the village; they had chewed up the old bits of walrus-hide—everything which could satisfy the cravings of hunger. At last they had perished miserably, dying by inches, with no hope of succor and no chance of escape. At least 500 of the poor wretches suffered this hideous death. To explain this terrible famine, which was as unusual as it was fatal, it must be added that the season was one of unparalleled severity. The natives of this island were large, robust men, and expert hunters and fishermen. But, like most of their race, they were improvident and made no provision for such a winter. The cold set in early and continued without interruption. The mercury was forty degrees below zero for weeks at a time. The cold and violent storms prevented them from going out on the ice to catch walrus and seals—their main dependence for food in the winter. Their scant stock of meat was soon exhausted; they were many miles from Siberia, and could not have reached it alive in the face of the bitter winter. At the northwest end of the island we found a settlement of about 250 people. These had suffered severely from the famine, only about one-half the original colony having survived. They had a larger stock of provisions than their unfortunate neighbors, and thus escaped complete annihilation.

The customs of the natives are savage and brutal. It is usual for the old people, when they feel that they can work no longer, to announce the fact to their children. Then the poor creatures are taken out of the hut, and either knocked on the head or stabbed by their sons. If they fail to give warning of their helplessness, the children are quick to detect the signs of age and promptly dispatch their parents, generally by beating them over the head. The bodies are seldom buried; they are cast to the dogs, who devour them. At this place also we had new evidence of some native peculiarities—the ease with which they could see at a great distance with the naked eye, and the marvelous way in which news was transmitted from the most distant points. A native will describe the dress and appearance of a man who is approaching at a great distance. A white man, even a sharp-eyed sailor, can just make out that it is a human figure. So, if anything occurs on the coast—if a piece of wreck comes ashore—the full particulars will be known a thousand miles from the spot where it occurred. It is a wonderful piece of telegraphy—one native rushing off to pass the news to another, and thus speeding intelligence over hundreds of miles of territory in a single day.

Quack Medicines and Their Mystery.

The toothache remedy, which the lady in Westerly was nearly killed by swallowing, was for external use, but there are patent medicines for external use, whose quieting or curative effects are expected to be of the five-minute order, and which are therefore of the most powerful and, it may be, of the most dangerous nature in certain conditions. People will resort to such things, and they will continue to be furnished so long as a market can be found for them, but it is suggested as one means of lessening the risk and deleterious effect that a law be passed requiring the ingredients of patent medicines to be published and sold with the bottles, so that if a person has mind to take opium or whisky, he will do it with a full knowledge and not under the disguise of an anodyne or an invigorator. Half the attraction of quack medicines comes from their mystery, and if this was removed some of them would be shunned and the greater part would at least be used more cautiously. Nothing can entirely prevent the people from being preyed upon until they become wise, but the law may interfere against the grosser and more dangerous forms of deceit.—Providence Journal.

New England Personal.

[From the Boston Daily Globe.]

Edwin A. Wadleigh, Esq., Clerk Superior Court, Boston, Mass., adds his name to the joyous army using and recommending St. Jacobs Oil. He certifies to a cure by the Great German Remedy of neuralgia and rheumatic pains in his family.

Dr. Hugh Glenn, the California farmer who owns 65,000 acres, has this year 45,000 acres in wheat. He has 320,000 sacks ready, each holding 140 pounds, but he thinks they will not hold his golden harvest. Dr. Glenn is a native of Virginia, a graduate in medicine, and was a soldier in the war with Mexico.

A North Carolina man planned to frighten his wife by a sham attempt at suicide. He was to very gently hang himself, and a friend was to cut him down; but the friend was not prompt, and the plotter was choked to death.

Homely Accomplishments.

There are a few of the accomplishments prized by our grandmothers which even in these days of machinery, of co-operation, and of luxurious living, we cannot afford to have classed with the lost arts. Among these is the art of plain sewing. In the olden times the sampler and patch-work made girlish fingers early acquainted with the use of the needle, and though no one can care to see those particular industries revived, yet there are few women who do not find sooner or later that in their lives "the needle bears equality with the beautiful craft of the pencil and the mighty power of the pen." Whether it is cheaper or not to buy ready-made under-clothing is not the question. The point insisted on is that every women should know how to make her own clothing neatly, skilfully and readily. She may add to this knowledge that of embroidery and lace-making just as she may add to a practical knowledge of bread-making that of making cake and desserts. There is great effort made nowadays to acquire accomplishments comparatively useless and the neglect of those which are of first consequence. The little girl may begin her apprenticeship to the needle by making doll clothes, and as patterns for all manner of lilliputian garments are for sale in pattern stores, she can learn to cut out and put together at the same time. Of course she must have instruction, direction, assistance; to give these is one of the purposes her mother was specially created for. By and by the juvenile seamstress may be promoted, and permitted to exercise her skill on larger garments and later be taught machine sewing. But before this she should master all the mysteries of "over and over" stitch, of hemming, felling, overcasting, catstitch, backstitch, gathering and facing down. Little folks always want to do what they can't do, and a promise of permission to undertake a difficult task will often stimulate a child to do well that which is entirely within her power. Then she should be permitted to enter upon larger undertakings.

Mending is another accomplishment possessed by very few young ladies. This branch of domestic industry is usually delegated to the mother or grandmother, and the young ladies play the piano or embroider when they should be more usefully employed in mending. This imposes a great deal of drudgery on the one who has all the mending to do, and releases from what should be a pleasant task, those most able to perform it. No matter how wealthy a young lady is, she should know when her wardrobe is in perfect order and be able to keep it so with her own hands. There is a very complete Manual of Mending recently published which gives full instructions in this most necessary and valuable accomplishment.

The Cabbage.

Just speak to a fine lady about cabbages and she will think that you have mentioned one of the lowest things on earth. Madam, you are wrong; it is one of the most useful articles of food. Those ancient nations did not know food science, but they knew the value of good and nourishing things, and gave them the place of honor which they deserved. Cabbages were thought of highly by ancient nations, and the Egyptians gave the cabbage the honor of letting it precede all their other dishes; they called it a divine dish. The Greeks and Romans had a great affection for cabbage, and conceived the idea, which I have myself, that the use of cabbage keeps people from drunkenness. I am persuaded that the constant eating of certain vegetables kills the desire for alcoholic beverages. Greek doctors ascribed all kinds of virtues to the cabbage. It was thought to cure even paralysis. Books were composed to celebrate the virtues of the cabbage, and ladies partook of it soon after childbirth. The Romans thought even more of the cabbage than the Greeks. They ascribe to it the fact that they could for six hundred years do without doctors, and Cato actually maintained that cabbage cured all diseases. The ancients knew several kinds of cabbage—the long-leaved green cabbage, the hard white, so much used in Germany for "sauerkraut" or fermented cabbage, the curly and the red. This last seems to have held the place of honor, and was first introduced by the Romans into Gaul or France, and then brought to Great Britain. Later the green-leaved cabbage was introduced. The Greeks were fond of aromatic seasonings—of oil, raisin wine, and almonds. They boiled or stewed the cabbage and seasoned it with cummin, coriander seed, with oil, wine, and gravy, making rich dishes of a vegetable, which we now boil in water, and reckon among the plainest food. Something like a remembrance of cooking cabbage among the old Greeks has come down to the modern Greeks, for they stuff cabbage leaves with dainty mince meat, and then stew them with gravy.—Mrs. Lewis, in Food and Health Leaves.

The Slip, the Cup and Lip.

"There's many a slip
'Tween the cup and the lip."

Some of our subscribers who have studied Greek may have seen the account in the Greek Readers:

A King of Thrace had planted a vineyard, when one of his slaves, whom he had much oppressed in that very work, prophesied that he should never taste of the wine produced in it. The monarch disregarded the prediction, and when at an entertainment, he held a glassful of his own wine made from the grapes of that vineyard, he sent for the slave and asked him what he thought of his prophecy now. To which the other replied: "Many things fall out between the cup and the lip," and had scarcely delivered this singular response before the news was brought that a monstrous boar was laying waste the favorite vineyard. Thinking in a rage, he put down the cup which he held in his hands and hurried out with his people to attack the boar, but being too eager, the boar rushed upon him and killed him without him having tasted of the wine.

Life is short at most, and our duty is to prolong it. Use, therefore, Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup for Coughs, Colds, Bronchitis, Hoarseness, etc. Sold everywhere. Price only 25 cents.

A Child's Library.

Our own experience has convinced us that, for the average child, the element of possession of a book is of great importance. The borrowed book, however attractive, is never read with the loving enthusiasm with which the child devours the volume that is his own. Try the experiment of loaning to your pupil Scott's Lady of the Lake, Robinson Crusoe, Arabian Knights. Give to another pupil the same book as his own property; in nine cases out of ten the borrowed book will be read on the gallop, hastily taken in and forgotten. The book owned by the child will be read leisurely, returned to, and lingered over with loving fondness; taken out under the trees in summer; taken down from the shelf for consultation; really assimilated into the mental and moral being. It is the most common-place truism that the value of reading does not depend half as much upon the quantity gone over as the quality of the book and the deliberate and thoughtful method of using it.

Now, the natural way to interest a child in reading is to give it a book, suitable to its years and mental condition, and leave it to its own way of appropriating its contents. Every child, nowadays, even the poorest in the public schools, should be encouraged to found a library. The boy who sees a growing book-shelf every morning, when he gets out of bed, will have a constant reminder to save his pennies to buy some favorite book, rather than spoil his stomach with candy or buy a ticket to the Black Crook. Nowadays, when readable editions of the English classics can be bought for fifty cents a volume, almost every child is able to buy a few books every year. It is surprising how soon such a library assumes respectable dimensions, and amazing how many beautiful books and valuable magazines are destroyed by children nowadays for want of some definite plan of keeping them together. And anybody who knows child nature can understand how much more thoroughly the books of that home-library will be read than the volume borrowed from any source.

* * * * *

Teachers and parents, set your children to this good work of founding a child's library, and keep them at it till they need no pushing from you. And it may turn out that a few shelves of good books will educate your child more than all the schools and universities.—N. E. Journal of Education.

"Save Dat Pocketbook!"

A negro planter came to Vicksburg, sold his cotton, put his money in his pocketbook, and started down the river. Leaning too far over the guards as the boat backed out, he fell overboard. His portemonnaie, which was in his side pocket, floated out and rode with his hat on the surface of the water, while the current carried the negro away. The yawl was lowered, and assistance at once started towards the drowning man, who, perceiving his treasure floating off, raised his voice and shouted;

His head went under and disappeared. As he rose up again he gasped:

"Dar's $118 in dat pocketbook."

Scarcely had he uttered the words before he sank a second time.

The yawl came within reach just in time to rescue the drowning African as he came to the surface for the last time. As soon as the water was wiped from his nose and mouth so that he could see and speak, he asked:

"Did—did you save dat pocketbook?"

"No," was the response.

"Well, den," said the negro, regretfully, "what do debbil was de use ob savin' me?"

[From the Akron Beacon.]

Our well known fellow-citizen Mr. E. Steinbacher, one of Akron's oldest merchants and the leading druggist of this section, informed the writer that without exception the sale of the Hamburg Drops was the most satisfactory of anything he had ever sold, and that the unprecedented demand was due solely to its merits. Such emphatic expressions need no comment on our part.

Educating Women.

Higher education among the middle classes has, within the past few years, wrought a far greater change in the social status of women than all the vaporing wordiness about their abstract rights and wrongs could ever have done; and here, as in other cases, practice has shown its advantage over theory. Secure in the possession of that power which has been aphoristically identified with knowledge, the true "girl of the period" regards as useless and effete all questions as to her intellectual equality with men. And well she may do so, considering the evidences of her power and capacity, in the face of the world. Take, for instance, the recent examinations of the London University. In French two ladies stand in the first class, none of their male rivals having got beyond the second. In German there is a lady in the first class; while one has obtained honors in Latin, two in English, and two in mathematics. These, together with the student from Newnham, who has taken honors in botany and chemistry, may smile at the old-fashioned prejudices which deny to womankind any footing on the difficult paths of science.—London Telegraph.

The Pleasures of Hope.

When the body is bowed with pain an intense longing for relief brings hope. This may brighten the suffering but it does not cure. At a time like this how welcome is such a friend as Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, bringing hope, health and happiness, and the joys of a renewed life.

George Mitchell, an Ohio wife murderer, declared that his condemnation to death was just, and that he would not have it changed if he could. He spent the night before the day appointed for the hanging in loud rejoicings that he was about to go to heaven; but, when a reprieve came, he shouted: "Blessed be God; didn't I always tell you that the Lord was on the side of a Christian man?"

Chinese Cruelty.

A large and heavy plank of wood floated past Hankow; the people saw that it had a most picturesque appearance; a fair damsel of 19, well dressed, was nailed on the plank so that she could move neither her hands nor feet. Beside her was the head of a Buddhist priest; attached on the right-hand side of the plank some cakes and other eatables so fixed that she could bend her neck and eat them, and on the left 3,000 copper cash, and inscribed below was: "This 3,000 cash is provided for her coffin when she is dead," and a special inscription was written above her head, whosoever pities her and endeavors to save her life they are guilty of "nan to yu chong," which means, "If men save her they are thieves, and if women save her they are defamed." The particulars are that this young damsel belonged to a wealthy family, and her two brothers are petty Mandarins who, holding certain posts in small yamuns at a place about twenty miles from Hankow, used this cruel treatment because she was guilty of criminal intercourse with the beheaded priest whose head was on the plank with her. Some report that she is saved, and others that she is still floating on the Yangtze River. —Shun Pao (China) July 17.

Food to Make Flesh.

Sugar, syrup, fresh cheese, wheaten grits, hominy, juicy meats, are the foods to make flesh. Almost any woman will get plump on brown bread and wheaten grits, or oatmeal eaten twice a day with plenty of meat and vegetables at breakfast and a supper of brown biscuit, with sweet-meats, cheese and cream, or coffee drank with plenty of sugar and cream. It is not necessary to eat largely if the appetite does not call for it, but the food must be tempting, and if hunger is keen, one who would be plump and spirited should not be afraid to indulge it. Unrelishing, distasteful food will not nourish and stimulate like what is piquant and savory and changed in variety day by day.—Scientific American.

You have read this notice about twenty times before. But did you ever act upon the suggestion so often made, namely: To ask any boot and shoe dealer for boots with Goodrich's Patent Hammer Steel Rivet Protected Sole? Guaranteed to outwear any Sole ever made. If you have not, do so the very next time you want boots or shoes with soles that will wear like iron and save repairs, and don't you buy any other. My references are any Sewing Machine Company or their agents in this country. H. C. GOODRICH, 19 Church St., Worcester, Mass., and 40 Hogne Ave., Chicago, Ill.

A Word to Greenbackers.

[Boston Weekly Globe.]

The positive charge of Mr. Dyer D. Lum, assistant secretary of the national executive committee of the greenback-labor party, that the "greenback national canvass as now conducted is manipulated in the interest of the republican party, and Gen. Weaver expenses borne in large measure from the republican campaign fund," will not surprise those who have paid any attention to Gen. Weaver's record, words and acts. Gen. Weaver's course for some time has certainly been in the interest of the republican and not of the greenback-labor party. Greenbackers and others who know Gen. Weaver personally, have been and will be slow to believe that he has deliberately sold himself and his party to the republicans. Mr. Lum's charge, however, is direct and positive, and he asserts that "the charges can be substantiated in every detail." Moreover, Mr. Lum is entitled to as much credence as Gen. Weaver, and is in a position to know whereof he asserts. He was an active factor in the organization of the greenback-labor party on a national basis, before Mr. Weaver was elected to congress and obtained prominence as a greenbacker, and since a national organization was effected he has been the real secretary of the national executive committee, and has done most of the work, though Col. Lee Crandall has nominally held the position. Concerning Mr. Crandall it is notorious at Washington that he has long been receiving republican money to keep his alleged greenback paper—the National View—alive and run it in the interest of the republican party. The fact that republican money has reached and corrupted even their own leaders will be an unpalatable one to the greenback-labor party voters, but it is a fact that should be looked squarely in the face. Are the friends of currency and labor reform willing to be deceived, sold out and made use of to give the republican party another four years' lease of power? Would such a result put an end to financial legislation in the interest of monopolies, relieve labor of its burdens, or help the greenback-labor party in any way?

VANDERBILT'S GREAT WEALTH.

The Many Wondrous Things His Money Will Accomplish.

Some one has made a very curious calculation of what Mr. Vanderbilt could do with his money. Mr. Vanderbilt's income from investments in 4 per cent. government bonds is represented at $5,000 daily, which is $208.25 per hour, $3.47 per minute, or over five cents per second. Assuming that he is paid by the second, he cannot possibly spend his money, as he could not select his purchases and lay down his money fast enough. He could not throw it away; to pick it up, cast, recover and cast again, would take him two seconds, and if he worked all through the twenty-four hours, without resting, he could only dispose of one-half of his income. By living economically, saving up for four years, he could, placing his five-cent pieces side by side, make a nickel belt around the earth, or by converting his savings into one-cent pieces and mounting them in a pile he would in twenty years, erect a road to the moon and have $500 to invest when he got there.

Should his amusement take a charitable twist he could, out of a year's receipts, donate to every man, woman and child in the United States twenty cents and have money left over. Other vast possibilities occur to the glowing fancy of the calculator. In one day he could go to 8,000 different circuses, eat 10,000 pints of peanuts, drink 5,000 glasses of lemonade, and have money left to get his boots blacked. He can afford to have 500,000 shirts washed in one day and on the day of his death his income will buy ten first-class funerals.

[New York World, Oct. 8.]

Yesterday's registration indicates that 200,000 electors will appear at the polls of this city on the 2nd of November, to take part in the contest between sectionalism as represented by Conkling, Arthur and Garfield, and the Union as represented by Hancock and the democratic party. No fewer than 72,580 voters were inscribed in the 678 election districts yesterday, being the first of the four registration days. This is 16,000 more than were registered on the same day in 1876, and nearly 85,000 more than attended to this duty on the first registration day of last year. Our friends in Ohio and Indiana may confidently look now to see New York roll up a majority of 65,000 votes for Hancock, despite the conspiracies of Davenport and his train band, his threatened "bulldozing" of naturalized citizens and the intimidation of his refurnished "cage." This with the contingent of Brooklyn means a march of the democracy from the metropolis with a column of 80,000 majority to meet and join hands with the democratic hosts of the interior.

The "Tribune" on Grant as a Politician.

[New York Tribune (Rep.), May 28, 1880.]

General Grant went home to his own state. What happened? A thing unprecedented in the history of the republic. His own state, proud of his name and fame, accorded him all the honor due his illustrious career, refused to antagonize the traditions of the past and the will of the present and pronounce against his candidacy! And General Grant, with all his laurels on his brow, counted as nothing the affection of a great people, but sent his lieutenants into the field to override the popular will, to trample down all the barriers of constitutional government and to wrench a battered candidacy from the hands of an angry and hostile majority. It is idle to attempt to relieve General Grant from the responsibility of this outrage. He was on the spot. He was in Chicago. He was in attendance at headquarters. He is not an idiot. One word from him would have stopped the pillage, and he did not speak the word. A great political crime was committed by his own friends before his eyes and he was silent.

An Englishman says that no other people in the world, so far as he knows can equal the Arkansans in off-hand exaggerations. "Do you see that spring over there, stranger?" said one of them to him. He said he did, whereon the settler added: "Well, that's an iron spring, that is; and it is so mighty powerful that the farmers' horses about here that drink the water of it never have to be shod. The shoes just grow on th-ir feet nat'rally."—Chicago Tribune.

A Popular and Reliable Company.

As to the soundness and standing of the Ohio Farmers' Insurance Company, the Indiana Farmer has the following editorial in the issue of May 29, 1880:

"Some of the foreign insurance companies are waging a war on the Ohio Farmers' Fire Insurance Company in this state, and report all manner of things about it. We had occasion to examine its reports and papers on file in the office of the Auditor of State this week, as well as those of other companies, and we found its affairs were frankly and freely open to the world, and that its condition compares favorably with other companies. We examined them with a view of ascertaining how much truth there was in statements of other and interested companies, and we believe that the company is sound, and does business safely. The fact that for 32 years it has promptly paid all losses, and accumulated nearly a million of capital besides, is a bit of practical experience in its favor that cannot be whistled down at a breath. It seems that the cause of the war and jealously is, that this company has become very popular among the farmers of the west, and taking no city or conflagration risks, can and does issue policies for less than the rates of some other companies."

The principal office of the company above named is located at Le Roy, Medina county, Ohio. Mr. C. G. Shepard is the soliciting agent for DeKalb county, Indiana and Defiance county, Ohio. For full particulars concerning the company, address F. M. Thompson, general agent, Hicksville, O.21-tf

Up, Boys, and At 'Em!

The following editorial article, which appears this morning in the New York World, embodies the judgment upon the elections of Tuesday last of the editor of that journal, who has been present here upon the ground and studying the situation and the outlook since Monday last.

The result of the state election held in Indiana on Tuesday is so far unsatisfactory that it imperitively requires a candid and fearless examination into the causes which have made such a result possible. It can not be truly said that Indiana has been put into the list of doubtful states by the election in October, as Maine, for example, was put into the list of doubtful states by the election in September. The republican campaign in Maine was conducted under conditions so favorable to republican success that the downfall of Senator Blaine and his party in that state has made it next to impossible for the republicans, under the stress of a general presidential action along the whole line, to recover their control of Maine in November, and to secure the vote of that state for Garfield. If the democratic campaign in Indiana had been conducted under conditions equally favorable to democratic success it would not now be necessary for democrats to inquire into the significance of the check which the party has there received. Indiana, though a democratic state before the war, has only returned to the democratic column within the last decade. Maine has been solidly republican for more than twenty years, when the most conspicuous living leader of the republican party, and its most popular candidate for the presidency, found himself swept from his feet by the inflowing surge of popular disgust with the republican party. If the constitutional cause had been put in issue in Indiana at the recent election of that state as distinctly as the cause of centralization was put in issue by Senator Blaine at the September election, in Maine, the loss of the governorship by the democrats might now be justly regared as proof that Indiana is drifting away again from the moorings of the constitutional cause, for the loss of the governorship by the republicans in Maine is justly regarded as proof that Maine has wearied of the excessive, expensive and exhausting centralization in which republicanism lives, moves and has its being.

"This, however, is far from being the truth. The national issues on which the presidential election is to turn did not command the full and united attention of either party in Indiana in the campaign which has just ended. These issues, of course, entered into the campaign and were considered by both parties. This appears from the fact that the democrats of Indiana have so sharply contested the control of the state legislature which is to choose a successor to that able and conscientious statesman, Senator McDonald, and of the state delegation in congress. If the campaign had been fought on those issues, as would have been necessarily the case had the election been held in November, no intelligent man can doubt, in the face of the returns which the World has already laid before its readers, that Indiana would have chosen a democratic governor and a whole state ticket of the same faith, as well as a democratic legislature and a democratic representative in Washington.

"But the democratic party was handicapped from the outset of the October contest by two things, either of which would probably have sufficed to bring about an unsatisfactory result. The only real cause for wonder is that both of these things, taken together, should not have sufficed to aggreve a relative democratic check into a sweeping republican victory. In the first place, great numbers of democrats in Indiana not only regard the holding of a state election in October as unwise in point of policy, but were seriously dissatisfied with the decision of the supreme court of the state under which the election was held. There can be no doubt that, as a point of policy, the holding of an election in October drew into the contest in Indiana the whole force of republican machinery, and enabled the republican managers to concentrate upon the state the vast resources at their command of all sorts, legitimate and illegitimate, as they could not have done and cannot do in the general election in November. Whatever the merits may be of the decision of the Indiana supreme court, which made the October election necessary—and upon that point the World need express no opinion—it unquestionably irritated a considerable and influential body of the democrats of Indiana and restrained them from cordial co operation in the contest. In the second place the well known financial opinions of the democratic candidate for the governorship of Indiana are regarded with extreme disfavor by great numbers of voters, and especially of German voters, [illegible] would gladly have given him a warm support. This was so marked a feature of the contest that the republicans adroitly enough threw the chief weight of their forces against the gubernatorial candidate. On the day of the election in Indianapolis the republicans openly offered votes on other candidates for votes in favor of Porter in the ratio in some cases of twenty to one. This was, of course, in keeping with the general use by the republicans of all means of political corruption, but it bears witness also to their own perception of one of the two weak points within the body of the democratic organization in Indiana, to which the result in that state must mainly be attributed, for, though nothing was left unattempted in the way of political debauchery by the republican managers—of whose use of repeaters and of illegal votes the democratic managers have positive documentary evidence, which will in due time be made public—all these devices would have failed of their effect had the democratic voters of Indiana co-operated as full and as cordially for the success of the state ticket at the polls in October, as it is quite sure that they will do for the success of the electoral ticket in November. It is best for parties as it is for men to look facts in the face, and to hold themselves chiefly responsible in most cases for the mishaps which overtake them. The result of Tuesday's election in Indiana does not prove that the republicans outnumber the democrats of that state. Still less does it prove that the voters of Indiana in November next will prefer Garfield and Arthur to Hancock and English. It only proves that the democratic party of Indiana is made up of earnest and independent voters who have clear and positive views of political principle as well as of political expendiency, and that it is not safe to leave either political principle or political expediency too much out of system in organizing a campaign which is to be fought by such voters. The presidential nominations of the national democracy command the absolute and united support of all such voters. It is perfectly well understood, and has been from the day of the Cincinnati nominations, that the national ticket is many thousand votes stronger in Indiana than the local ticket, and the democrats of the Union may rest assured that the sun had not fairly set on the local democratic defeat of Tuesday, October 12, before the democratic organization of Indiana was put in thorough order to secure to Indiana her due part in the great democratic victory of November 2."

November.

If democrats are true to themselves and to their country, they will not abate their zeal for the presidential ticket. Admitting all that is claimed by the republicans of Indiana, it does not follow that the democratic cause is lost in November. Hancock is 10,000 stronger than any candidate on the democratic ticket in October. To allow the defeat claimed by the republicans to demoralize the democratic party of Indiana would be to the last extreme discreditable. We call upon democrats to preserve their organization—to not abate their zeal, but to "up and at them." The republican party has exhausted its resources. Indiana is to-day democratic. With proper effort it can be carried for Hancock and English. What is wanted is nerve, spine, sand. Just now there is a good deal of brass-horn republicanism on the streets. Let it go for what it is worth. Let democrats preserve their organizations, and perfect them. Hancock, the "superb," leads the democracy of the republic to-day, and, though a defeat has overtaken the party in Indiana, by a united effort we can win in November. We do not surrender [—Indianapolis Sentinel

Indiana.

(St. Louis Republican.)

Our returns from Indiana leave no doubt of the democratic defeat in that state. They indicate that Porter and probably the whole republican state ticket is elected. The republicans claim the legislature and their claim will probably have to be conceded. It insures the election of a republican senator in place of McDonald, democrat. It appears, too, that the republicans gain one congressman, changing the delegation from six democrats, six republicans and one greenbacker to seven republicans and six democrats. This sums up the whole story of the defeat, and certainly it is bad enough. The entire truth may as well be recognized and the duty which it imposes prepared for. It would be ungenerous to upbraid the Indiana democrats for this reverse, which, through them, falls on the whole party. We believe they did their whole duty; we believe, too, [illegible] democratic state [illegible] it was four years ago, and that the fact would have been exhibited last Tuesday but for the extravagant use of money in the state by the opposite party, and it is cheering to be told that the fact will be exhibited at the election in November, when the weight of Hancock's good and great name shall play its full part in the contest.

The Democratic Party.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

We invite our republican neighbors to remember November. The democratic party never dies. It is not mortal. It is immortal.

The principles of the democratic party must survive if the republic survives. Republicanism is hostile to the republic. Republicanism means death to civil liberty—death to the rights of states and the rights of man. Republicanism is a coffin. It means a funeral. Republicanism kills. It means centralization. It presupposes an empire. It is in opposition to the traditions of the republic. The people, when the sober second thought is enthroned, will see it, and reverse their decision. The democratic party makes no compromises with fanaticism. Its principles are eternal. Crushed to earth they rise again. Democrats bide their time. The country can suffer no greater calamity than the exile of the democratic party from power. Republicanism is built upon the foundations of fraud. Its rule means ruin. The people in due time will see it in all of its hideousness, and then will come the reaction. To-day Indiana seems to have succumbed to a tidal wave of fanaticism, but in November we hope for a reversal of the verdict.

"Didn't 'Filiate."

A colored man was busily engaged in sawing some wood for a Galveston gentleman. The "man and brother" had a large masonic breast-pin on his shirt bosom.

"Do you colored Masons and white Masons fillyate?"

"Don't fillyate wuff a cuss."

"What's the matter?"

"Dunno boss, but I'se tried it. Dar is a bar-keeper in dis town what toted dis heah berry same emblem. I was in distress; hadn't had a dram all dat mornin'. I cum in an' gabe de distress signal."

"Did he respond?"

"He done respond right. He made a motion at de doah wid one hand, and reached under de bar. I made de sign once moah, an' he fotched me between de shoulders wid de bung-starter, jess as I was gwine out de doah."[—Galveston News.

A North Carolina Marriage.

Soon after the close of the last war Captain X. was appointed a justice of the peace in a country place not far from Raleigh, North Carolina.

His father had been a planter in a rather small way, and his son, the captain, had acquired considerable experience in the business of managing real estate, drawing up deeds, etc., during the father's lifetime, and then in settling the estate after his decease. Further than this he had no legal knowledge, and, indeed, his entire stock of "book-learning" was small and poorly selected, but any lack in general information was fully made up, for his uses, by self-assertion. Late one afternoon, as he was riding home from Raleigh, he met a young woman and two men, who hailed him and inquired if he was Captain X. The young woman and one of the men wished to be married at once. The other had come as a witness. They had procured the necessary license, but an irate father was on their path, and swore that they never should be married. It was considered on all accounts safest to have the ceremony performed without delay, and try pacification afterward.

Now the captain had never witnessed a marriage, and naturally had no very clear idea of what was usual in such cases. He remembered having seen a book about the house years before with a form of marriage in it, but what the book was, and where it was, he could not remember.

"Why," said he, when he told the story afterward, "I knew the 'Postle's creed and commandments, and at first I thought I'd use 'em to begin on, but then I reckoned, on the whole, they were too durned solemn."

He asked the couple to come to his house, secretly hoping that he could find that book, but they declined, for the reason that the matter admitted of no delay.

A less assured man would have been sorely perplexed, but not he. He lost no time in removing his hat, and remarked: "Hats off in the presence of the court." All being uncovered, he said, "I'll swear you in fust off. Hold [illegible]

"Me too?" ask the friend of the groom.

"Of course," said the captain, "all witnesses must be sworn. You and each of you solemnly swear that the evidence you shall give in this case shall be the truth, th' 'ole truth, an' nothin' but the truth, s'elp you God. You, John Marvin, do solemny swear that to the best of your knowledge an' belief you take this yer woman ter have an' ter hold for yerself, yer heirs, exekyerters, administrators, and assigns, for your an' their use an' behoof forever?"

"I do," answered the groom.

"You, Alice Ewer, take this yer man for yer husband, ter hev an' ter hold forever; and you do further swear that you are lawfully seized in fee-simple, are free from all incumbrance, and hev good right to sell, bargain and convey to the said grantee yerself, yer heirs, administrators and assigns?"

"I do," said the bride, rather doubtfully.

"Well, John," said the captain, "that will be about a dollar'n' fifty cents."

"Are we married?" asked the other.

"Not by a durned sight ye ain't," quoth the captain with emphasis, "but the fee comes in here." After some fumbling it was produced and handed to the "court" who examined it to make sure that it was all right, and then pocketed it, and continued: "Know all men by these presents, that I, Captain X., of Raleigh, North Carolina, being in good health and of sound and disposin' mind, in consideration of a dollar'n' fifty cents to me in hand paid, the receipt whereof is hereby acknowledged, do and by these presents have declared you man and wife during good behavior, and, until otherwise ordered by the court."

The men put on their hats again, the young couple, after shaking their benefactor's hand, went on to meet their destiny and the irate father, while the captain rode home richer in experience.—Editor's Drawer, in Harper's Magazine for November.

Democratic National Ticket.

For President,
[illegible] S. HANCOCK,
of Pennsylvania.
For Vice President,
WILLIAM H. ENGLISH,
of Indiana.

[illegible] democrats to dama Landers.

The [illegible] that the republicans rode into office on, will now strike for the cotton fields of the south.

Democrats do not surrender. Republicans will hear from them on the second day of November. Hancock is a stronger man in Indiana than Landers.

Cuyahoga, Garfield's native county, in 1879 gave a republican majority of 5,565, and in 1880 a majority of 3,879, a democratic gain of 1,686.

The people said last Tuesday that they could not spare Judge Taylor to go to congress, but the Steuben Republican has commenced to push him for U. S. senator, to [illegible] McDonald.

The epizootic is raging throught Cincinnati and other western cities. It was in 1872 that this disease raged among the horses with such disastrous results, and it is feared that it is going to prove as damaging this year as then.

From all portions of the state comes reports that democrats, instead of feeling discouraged, have gone to work zealously for the cause in November. Indiana is to-day fairly democratic, and the cause of Hancock will, we believe, triumph at the presidential election.

We were in error last week in stating that the entire democratic ticket excepting sheriff was elected. Mr. Ephriam Shipe for commissioner from first district was beaten eight votes by Fred. D. Oberlin. Mr. Shipe was reported elected until the official vote was had.

It should not be forgotten that in the four years of 1873-4-5-6, when the republican party had absolute power, their expenditures were $7[illegible],333,542.67, and for 1877-8-9 and 1880, when the democrats had control of congress, the expenditures were $[illegible],795,155.79, or $[illegible],417,[illegible].[illegible]8 less than in the four years preceding.

"Hancock is a fine soldier. At the time he was named a major general we were not very good friends, and my personal preferences were for Schofield; but I felt Hancock had earned the promotion, and gave his name to Stanton. I have great respect for Hancock as a man and as a soldier."—[Ulysses S. Grant before Hancock's nomination.

Mr. English said to-day, in conversation with some friends, that he had not for a moment thought of giving up the contest in Indiana. The fight would be made for success in November just as though there had been no reverse in October. He says the republicans of the United States added a million dollars to the wealth of Indiana in order to gain a temporary advantage at the election in October, and as he is interested in the financial prosperity of the state, he will, at least, force the republicans to keep up their assessments and contributions for Indiana. He takes a very philosophical view of the situation, and proposes, from now until November, to give the republicans "the very best fight in the shop."

Grant in June, 1880, said: "I have nothing to say against Gen. Hancock. I have known him for forty years. His personal, official and military record is good."

Grant in October, 1880, said: "When the army of the Potomac was looking for a leader it tort almost everybody—even came over into the west for officers—but nobody ever even suggested Hancock for the place. After he received that vote in 1864 he had 'the bee' in his bonnet, and shaped everything to gain democratic and southern favor. He has watched and planned and waited till at last he has received the democratic nomination. "General, do you think he is in sympathy with the south?" "He is crazy to be president. He is ambitious, vain and weak. They will easily control him." It appears, therefore, that Grant has changed an opinion of forty years' standing because Hancock was nominated for the presidency.

To Democrats.

There is not the least reason to feel discouraged over the late election in this state. The republicans succeeded by the barrel use of money in electing their state ticket by little more than two thousand majority. The increase of republican votes in Indianapolis, Richmond and other cities in the state in proportion is unquestioned. Our state capitol cast a vote large enough for a city of 200,000 inhabitants. Over 18,000 more votes were polled in the state than were enumerated in the census of three months ago. Do you call that a fair, honest election? How was it in DeKalb county? Scores of poor men in the democratic ranks were approached by minions of the corrupt republican party to vote their ticket, and offered money for their influence. Hundreds of dollars were spent in this nefarious manner, by the leaders of the republican party. It is known that money was brought into this county from abroad to purchase votes, and that it was used with all the low, dirty trickery of the campaign. Now that the entire country votes on the second of next November, it will be impossible for them to import their minions and money in this state as they did before, and the opportunity has arrived for democrats to show all honest people that the late election was not a fair, honest expression of the will of the people.

Then let democrats stand by their guns, and remember that they are fighting for honest government, fighting for a free, fair ballot, fighting for that very liberty that is guaranteed by the constitution.

This is no time to halt. If Hancock had surrendered at the first shock of battle, where would we have been today? The cohorts of fraud and misrule have gained only a temporary victory. Let their next assault be met by all lovers of constitutional liberty and honest government, as Hancock met the last charge of the confederates at Gettysburg, by hurling them back into the seething caldron of corruption, from whence their low trickery and demagoguery springs.

"Union Men to the Front."

At the republican jollification here last Monday night, one transparency read "Union men to the front, rebels to the rear." This may look well as a transparency, but let us give it a local interpretation, and see how it shows up. The only Union soldier on the republican ticket in this county was Mr. Provines, a man who was but a living skeleton when he returned from the rebel prison during the war. He went forth and fought and suffered for his country, and came back but a wreck of his former self. On the other hand Mr. Leas, who is known to have labored for this glorious Union through a system of substitute brokerage, that made him money, and speculated on the necessities of war while his victims went forth to bleed and die, came out of the contest the only onee elected on the republican ticket to a remunerative office. And why did he succeed? Because the leading republic ans all over the county concentrated all their efforts upon him, and worked with might and main for his success, while the poor soldier, he who should have had a grateful place in his party, as a defender of the inestimable privileges we now enjoy, was ignored and almost forgotten. Broken in health, wanting in physical vigor, he goes unrecognized by these very demagogues who cry "Union men to the front." That is what the transparency means in DeKalb county. Out upon such infernal cant, such devilish, contemptible meanness.

Mrs. O'Leary and Her Cow.

October [illegible] was the ninth anniversary of the [illegible] Chicago fire, which raged two days and nights, devasting 2100 acres, destroying 18,000 buildings, causing a loss of $200,000,000 worth of property. Mrs. O'Leary, whose cow has become famous, is still living. Her family consists of herself, husband and three children. The house where they lived at the time of the fire still stands on DeKoof street, near Jefferson, but they have moved away out on the prairie, and are keeping pigs and chickens. A reporter who went there, to day, was met at the door by Mrs. O'Leary's son, who would not let him see the old lady. He said she would not talk about the cow and the lamp, which was all a newspaper lie, anyway. He said: "We were all asleep, and when a neighbor pulled us out the barn was afire in the roof. Our cows and everything in it were burned. If it had not been for that we wouldn't be working now."

AN INTERESTING CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN WADE HAMPTON AND JOHN SHERMAN.

SHERMAN CHARGES HAMPTON WITH BEING THE LEADER OF THE KU-KLUX

Hampton Tells Him that Its a Falsehood and Gives Him His Address.

Dagger's Springs, Sept. 17, 1880.

To Hon. John Sherman, secretary of the treasury:

Sir:—Some days ago I saw a report of your speech at a conference held by the national republican committee, at the Fifth avenue hotel, New York, and you were quoted as having used the following language:

"And now you are asked to surrender all you have done into the hands of Wade Hampton and the ku-klux, and the little segment in the north that is called the democratic party." May I ask if you used these words, and if you did so, did you mean to connect me, directly or indirectly, with what was known as the ku-klux-klan, and requesting an early reply, addressed to me, care of Augustus Schell, Esq., New York, I am, very respectfully, your obedient servant.

Wade Hampton.

Washington, D. C., Sept. 21, 1880.

To Hon. Wade Hampton, care Augustus Schell, Esq., New York:

Sir:—Your note of the 17th inst. is received, in which you inquire whether, at a conference held by the national republican committee, at the Fifth avenue hotel, New York, I used the language attributed to me, as follows: "And now you are ask to surrender all you have done into the hands of Wade Hampton and the ku-klux and the little segment in the north that is called the democratic party." In reply, I have to advise you that while I do not remember the precise language, I presume the reporter correctly stated, in a condensed way, his idea of what I did say. I no doubt spoke of you as the leading representative of the democratic party in the south, and referred to the ku-klux-klan as the representative of the barbarous agencies by which the democrats have subverted the civil and political rights of the republicans of the south. I did not connect you, personally, with the ku-klux-klan. Indeed, I knew that you had, in one or two important instances, resisted and defeated its worst impulses. I appreciate the sense of honor which makes you shrink from being named in connection with it. Still you and your associates, leading men in the south, now enjoy the benefits of political power, derived from the atrocites of the ku-klux-klan, in which phrase I include all the numerous aliases by which it has from time to time been known in the south. Your power in the southern states rests upon actual crimes of every grade in the code of crimes, from murder to the meanest form of ballot-box stuffing, committed by the ku-klux-klan and its kindred associates, and, as you know, some of the worst of them have been committed since 1877, when you gave the most solemn assurance of protection to the freedmen of the south, and these crimes are all aimed at the civil and political rights of the republicans in the south, and, as I believe, but for these agencies, the very state that you represent, as well as many other states in the south, would be represented, both in the senate and house, by republicans. But for these crimes the boast attributed to you that 138 solid southern votes would be cast for the democratic ticket would be but idle vaporing, but now we feel that it is the sober truth. While I have no reason to believe that you or your northern associates personally participated in the offenses I have named, yet while you and they enjoy the fruits of these crimes you may in logic and morals be classed as I have classed you—as joint co-partners with the ku-klux-klan in the policy which thus far has been successful in seizing political power in the south, and which it is hoped, by the aid of the small segment of the democratic party in the north, may be extended to all departments of the government. It is in this sense that I spoke of you, the ku-klux klan and the northern democratic party. Permit me in conclusion, while frankly answering your question, to say the most fatal policy for the south would be by such agencies as I have mentioned to secure again political ascendancy in this country, for I assure you that the manhood and independence of the north will certainly continue the struggle until every republican in the south shall have a free and unrestricted enjoyment of equal civil and political privileges, including a fair vote, a fair count, free speech and free press, and the agitation made necessary to secure such results may greatly affect injuriously the interests of the people of the south. Very respectfully your obedient servant,

John Sherman.

Charlottesville, Va., Oct. 1, 1880.

Sir:—Your letter has been received. As you did not disclaim the language to which I called your attention, I have only to say, that in using it you uttered what was false, and what you knew to be false. My address will be Columbia, South Carolina. I am your obedient servant,

Wade Hampton.

To John Sherman.

Washington, D. C., Oct. 1880.

To Wade Hampton, Columbia, S. C.:

Sir:—I have to acknowledge the receipt of your note of the 1st inst., handed me unopened by Mr. C. McKenley a few moments ago. After my return from the west I had this morning read what purported to be an extract of a speech made by you published in the Charleston News and Courier, and upon your general reputation as a gentleman denied that you had made such a speech or written such a letter as is attributed to you in that paper. What I stated to you in my letter of September 21 I believe to be true, notwithstanding your denial, and it can be shown to be true by public records and as a matter of history. As you had, long before your letter was delivered to me, seen proper to make a public statement of your views of the correspondence, I will give it to the press without note or comment, and let the public decide between us. Very respectfully,

John Sherman.

Forward!

To the democrats and independent voters of Indiana:

The result of the election last Tuesday is a deep disappointment to us all. The extent of the success which the republican party has achieved in this state is as much a surprise to the republicans as it is to the democrats, and proves that the majority of the republican party were as ignorant of the means which their corrupt leaders were employing as we were. The temporary loss of our state is a loss that time will enable us to retrieve, but the injury which our free institutions will sustain, resulting from the frauds and corruptions practiced by the republican leaders to secure their triumph, is incalculable.

The causes which enabled the republican party to succeed in the late election are now plainly:

1. The partial success of their scheme to Africanize our state for political purposes.
2. The corrupt use of money for the purchase of votes.
3. The importation and use of repeaters, protected by deputy marshals; and,
4. The aid derived by them from the use of the "federal machinery" of elections, under the pretense of supervising the election of members of congress.

In the presidential election we will not have to encounter these forces to the same extent as in the state election. Their corruption fund will have to be divided among many states; their repeaters will be at home, and those of them who have been discharged from arrest by deputy marshals on straw bail will not be likely to make their appearance in our state soon again. We shall have no federal marshals or federal machinery to contend against.

We are thoroughly united in our councils, and whatever our adversaries may say to the contrary is untrue.

We, therefore, call upon you not to relax any of your efforts. Put new life and energy into your county and township organizations, and take all measures in your power to bring our full strength to the polls. The same vote polled by us in October, if polled in November, will secure to us the state. The average majority against us at the late election will not exceed 4,000, and may fall below that figure. This majority can, and in our opinion, will be overcome in the presidential election. A change of three votes in each precinct will accomplish it. Remember you have a leader in this contest who never sounds a retreat, and he commands an army that never surrenders.

Indiana

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

The editor of the New York World writes his paper from this city in a way that should forever put at rest the rumors which have been extensively circulated by the correspondents of certain newspapers. He says: "As a matter of fact, Mr. English, Senator McDonald and ex-Senator Barnum have co-operated most cordially and efficiently in the recent canvass in this state. It is the deliberate statement of Senator McDonald that no one could devote himself more earnestly and unreservedly to the work of the party than Mr. English in his capacity of chairman of the state committee. There is not a shadow of ill-feeling between Mr. English and the national democratic committee, represented in this canvass in Indiana by Mr. Barnum. None of the active managers of the party [illegible] perhaps fully realized the extent to which the local canvass had been affected by the unstinted use of money here during the week preceding the election by the republicans, but now that this corruption fund has been expended and that the democratic disaffection with the gubernatorial nominee has worked itself off in the state election, the democratic managers, measuring exactly the situation, are taking steps to reform the whole democratic line and throw democratic Indiana with renewed energy into the battle for November. Mr. English will at once call the committee together and concert a plan of action for the presidential rally. He will be warmly supported by Senator McDonald and by the whole democratic strength of this state, and he will receive the most cordial encouragement from the national committee. If the republicans are wise they will not proceed to make arrangements with Mr. Garfield for the distribution of more than 829 of the federal offices in Indiana until they have carefully perused and pondered the sad tale of the enthusiastic hunter who sold the skin of a bear before he had made sure of the bear."

It is hardly necessary to repeat that the statement of the Indianapolis Evening News and other republican papers, that Mr. English has been pressed to withdraw from the national ticket, is utterly unfounded and most foolishly absurd. The subject has not even been mentioned to him. There is no reason why it should be. No one has any such authority, and a change of front on the eve of the great battle would be unprecedented and disastrous. The rumor was started by republicans and certain political eunuchs, and is not countenanced by the democracy at all. Indiana will vote for Hancock and English in November, and they would be elected even without the vote of Indiana.

—The Presbyterian synod of northern Indiana, comprising 140 churches and 88 ministers, will convene at Fort Wayne to-day. The session will hold up to and including Monday.

—If the "proof of affection is a tear," Sam. Puffenberger is the truest man to his party we have heard of since the campaign opened. He actually dropped a tear over the defeat of Jay J. VanAuken.

—L. J. Hopkins will move with his family to Decatur, Michigan, next week, where he will engage in the milling business. Lute is an enterprising young man, and we regret to note his departure.

—Charles Pommert made a trip to Edgerton, Ohio, last Friday, returning Saturday. He made the round under the shades of night, and he says he waited nine hours for a train at Auburn Junction. There's something not exactly right about this story.

—Miss J. D. Belmer, of Roway, N. J., is paying her sister, Mrs. W. E. Rush, a visit. To-morrow (Friday) Mrs. R. expects all her brothers and sisters, six in number, to meet at her home, everything being prepared for a grand re-union of the family. A happy meeting and a joyous time is anticipated.

—Last Sunday evening a transient man dropped in at Hollister's restaurant for, as he said, a lunch. Being pretty full of distilled corn-juice, he forgot he was not in a variety hall, and made a little more noise than was consistent with Sherm's. views, and thereupon he got the one, two, three, spilling himself all over the sidewalk. After he had resurrected himself he took a walk.

Cruelty to Animals.

Last Monday a cruel individual from the rural districts came in town on one of Balsam's steeds, and after transacting his business started home. The animal became contrary and refused to go, when the rider fell to beating it most unmercifully. A humane gentleman approached and commenced remonstrating with him about cruelty to animals. "See here, mister," replied the rural man, "this here animal belongs to me, and things have come to a hell of a pass, when a man can't wollop his own jackass."

A Row in Corunna.

The families of Oliver Rosenbury and Daniel Chilcoat have been trying to dwell together beneath the same roof. This is a fatal mistake. Two game-cocks can live together in brotherly love in the same barn-yard far more successfully than the smallest families can live in the largest house. These families, it appears, have had numerous little disturbances, and last Thursday a difficulty arose between them concerning a clothes-line, so we are informed, and Dan. Chilcoat struck Oliver Rosenbury on the hip with an axe, inflicting a very ugly though not fatal wound. Chilcoat was arrested and lodged in jail, where he was kept till last Monday, when he was released, his brother giving bond in the sum of $500 for his appearance.

Gone.

In the transmutations of time many are the changes, some sad, some wise and some otherwise, that are wrought in human life. Some friends die, others move away, and still others go and slip their heads in the matrimonial noose. This sad train of thought was occasioned this morning by the announcement, accompanied with a supply of elegant cake, that our much-esteemed lady friend, Miss Effie Wunderlich, was married at the residence of her father, in Columbia city, to Mr. W. F. McNagny, a young attorney of that city. Mr. McNagny is a superior gentleman, and though young, ranks at the head of the bar in Columbia City. In his selection of a life-partner he has shown an appreciation of mental excellence in woman, for Miss Effie has many rare qualities of both mind and heart. With two such heads together, the problem of life will undoubtedly be successfully solved. Miss Effie has many warm friends in Auburn, and we know they will join with us in wishing for one so worthy, all the happiness that can fall to the lot of mortals. Good-bye.

Neighborhood Nippings.

Albion had a very disasterous fire Thursday evening, Oct. 7. The New Era says of it. "The building cost, we understand, between $12,000 and $15,000. Upon it there was an insurance of $8,000. C. B. Philips had a stock of goods worth perhaps $18,000 or $20,000. Insured for $10,000. Chas. H. Moltz had a stock of goods valued at fully $11,000. He had no insurance whatever, and his actual loss is greater than any of the others. Sunday's building was torn down and totally destroyed. It was worth perhaps $500 or $600. Insured for $300. The losses of other parties in the removal of goods, etc., were considerable. It is the heaviest blow the business of our town has yet sustained, and we trust may be the last. Mr. Moltz has been given temporary quarters in the drug-store of Hamlin & Skinner, while C. B. Philips will temporarily occupy a portion of the room now occupied as a grocery store by A. J. Kimmell, in John Black's brick block."

The Valparaiso Messenger says: "On the fourth day of October, A. D., 1880, at seven o'clock, p. m., we deposited a letter in the Valparaiso postoffice addressed to Hon. Wm. Fleming, Indianapolis, Ind. The letter was strongly sealed with red wax, in the same way that money packages are secured. Mr. Draper, the deputy postmaster, informs us that the letter was sent off at 6:35 the next morning by the way of Chicago. By hard work, so we were informed by telegraph, it reached Indianapolis on the evening of the 9th of October. That letter was held back from its rightful owner either at Chicago or Indianapolis."

Fred. H. Whipple, of Toledo, long the telegraph and city editor of the Commercial, has accepted a position of city editor of the Fort Wayne Sentinel. He is an excellent newspaper man, and the local department of that newsy little sheet will be well looked after. The Sentinel will soon be enlarged to a seven-column paper. The subscription will hereafter be 10 cents a week.

Sunday night last Paschal Carter, a well-to-do farmer residing one mile east of Seymour, Ind., was robbed of two notes, one for $500 the other for $105, and $45 in greenbacks. The thief effected an entrance into the house by sliding a window sash. The property stolen was in Mr. Carter's pants pocket, which was hanging on the bed where he slept. A fine watch was left in the pants untouched. No clue as yet. The robbery occured a little after midnight.

—Our former townsman, H. H. Stanets, who has lattely located in South Chicago, was in Auburn the later part of last week, settling up his affairs. Many of our citizens who know Mr. Stanets as an affable gentleman, part with him regretfully. He will engage in the commission business, and his ability as a business man, and uniform courtesy to all, is a guarantee of success.

—John Baker, of Corunna, and Sarah Garger, of Auburn, were married Monday.

—Jacob Walborn leaves to-day for a hunt in northern Michigan. He will return before the election.

—$3,000 worth of clothing to close out at cost, at McQuiston & Ralston's. 42-3w.

—Miss Cleveland availed herself of the excursion rates Tuesday, and paid the village of Chicago a visit.

—A couple of car-loads of potatoes have been shipped here from Michigan, to supply home consumption.

—Some one who believes that brevity is the soul of wit, writes: "Don't eat Q-cumbers. They'll W up."

—There is a plentiful lack of wood in town. People from the country will find quick sales for all they will bring.

—Sam. Pommert charges democrats 20 cents to get shaved. Their faces have become elongated since the election.

—It is pleasant to know that as the cold weather comes on the number of humbug patent medicine venders will grow less.

—An exchange remarks that there is many a girl called a "daisy" before marriage, who after a few years looks like a faded "buttercup."

—Mr. J. E. Shilling and wife, of Auburn, will leave in a few days for a two or three months' visit to their children in Saginaw county, Michigan.

—Frank Davenport took passage on the Jackson road Monday for Indianapolis, where he will remain about a week.

—The excursion Tuesday over the Jackson road contained ten well-filled coaches. Several persons from Auburn availed themselves of the reduced rates.

—The way the seasons are getting mixed up, as was the case last Sunday when the green leaves were beautifully snowed under, indicates that the weather clerk was a little off.

—Miss Louie Henry, having a sympathy for despondent democrats, last Saturday presented the COURIER office with a large bouquet of the last flowers of summer. Many thanks.

—The Presbyterian social will be entertained in the basement rooms of the church on next Wednesday afternoon, by Mrs. Ford, Mrs. Elson and Mrs. Baker. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

MRS. J. E. ROSE, Sec'y.

—On last Monday over $1,800 were paid out for wheat at the Jackson elevator. Farmers don't take your wheat away when you can get more or as much as at any point in this section.

—W. H. Dills informs us that preparatory to re-entering the practice of his profession, he has engaged a new and eligible room for an office on Main street, where he expects to be found on and after Nov. 1 next. tf.

Belle. Donaldson,	Jacob Easley,
Charles Eldrart,	Sign. Gearsign,
Susan Hackebgor,	J. M. Henkry,
H. B. Norton,	Elick. Seltenright.

—Fred. Davis is not one of those kind of roosters that catches the early potato-bugs. He was to begin work in his father's hardware store Monday morning, but did not get up until eleven o'clock.

—The charming actress, Miss Lizzie Evans, who gained the admiration of our theatre-going people about a year ago, will appear with the Standard company next Monday night at Ensley's hall.

—Wm. N. Compston, recognized among the best tragedians in the profession, will appear each evening in his thrilling acts, during the entire engagement of the Standard company next week.

—Our newly-elected county surveyor, Mr. A. P. Foltz, received in Auburn precinct the significant number of "329" votes, just the number of dollars DeGolyer Garfield "borrowed" from Mr. Ames.

—Mr. Isaac Ochs has purchased the brick dwelling at the corner of Main and Second streets from the First national bank and we understand will move his family to Auburn immediately.

—Mr. G. A. Porter, he of the grocery store, has sold his establishment to Mr. Staybaugh, of Butler. He feels too good over the election of his namesake to the office of governor to work any more. Who knows but what he has his eye on the private secretaryship?

—The first part of the week was oh, so dreary and suicide-provoking. The sun and moon hid their faces, and for three long, miserable days the black clouds hung like a pall over the face of the earth. No warmth, no light, all dreariness. Is it possible that heaven had gone into mourning over the radical victory in Indiana last Tuesday?

—We omitted to mention last week that Wilson McClellan and Sam. Snyder, who are attending school at Ann Arbor, put in an appearance here last Tuesday. The object of their visit was to deposit their votes for democracy, which they did, but without avail. These young men say that republican boys from Ohio and Indiana in attendance at Ann Arbor were furnished free passes to go home and vote, but that the democratic boys could not even get a telegram through.

—The republicans gave vent to their feelings last Monday night in Auburn. They had a small-sized torch-light procession and shot off several Roman candles and firecrackers, after which they retired to Ensley's hall, where the outfit was addressed by Messrs. Penfield, Hartman and Lockhart. There were no democrats killed, and no damage done that we heard of, except that our woodpile, just in front of the office, shrunk up considerably that night. The republicans manifest a great contempt for poor democrats, and the latter feel very humble, but if it is possible, we would like to continue to live in this country.

—The Waterloo band came over to Auburn Friday night and serenaded our republican sheriff. R. Wes McBride, of Waterloo, in a squeaky voice, made a congratulatory speech to Mr. Leas, which was as pathetic as a blacking-box lable, and which brought tears to the eyes of many, including a donkey hitched near the jail residence. Mr. W. L. Penfield, on behalf of Mr. Leas, made a very nice speech of welcome. In speaking of the republican victory in this state, this gentleman could not resist the temptation to shake that old ensanguined garment. He said that the triumph meant that there would be no more of the "shot-gun policy of the south," etc. Mr. Penfield is a gentleman of ability, and is not blinded by partisan or sectional feeling, and we know from his own mouth that he does not believe these silly things, but then, you know, he is a republican, and must fan the flame of sectional hate.

MRS. FRANCIS C. COQUILLARD.

(St. Joseph Valley Register.)

Mrs. Francis C. Coquillard, relict of the late Alexis Coquillard, died at 7 o'clock, Monday morning, of general debility, after having been confined to her bed since March. In her death, South Bend losses the first woman who dared the dangers and endured the privations of pioneer life when the spot on which the city is located was a howling wilderness, inhabited only by Indians and wild beasts; the first woman to bring among the savages of this section the refining influences of civilized and christian life, and through whose exertion and services the germ of civilization was deposited here.

Mrs. Coquillard was the most remarkable person in the history of St. Joseph county, sharing as she did the duties, the privations and honors of her remarkable husband. Her maiden name was Francis C. Compare, and she was born in Detroit, April 9, 1806. In 1824, at the age of nineteen, she was married in Fort Wayne to Alexis Coquillard and soon afterward came with him to the site of the present city of South Bend, where he had established a trading post. Being a woman of strong mind, active temperament, indomitable courage and shrewdness remarkable in a woman she proved a strong aid to her husband in his dealings with the Indians. She accompanied him in his long fatiguing journeys or remained to take charge of the post and cope single handed with the Indian traders. The aid she was enabled to render her husband in his business was largely due to the strong influence she was not long in obtaining over the Indians, which was frequently manifested in councils when a few words from her would restore good feelings and avert a threatened danger. She was to the poor, untutored Indians of that day a vertible Good Samaritan. She nursed them in their sickness, sympathized with them in their sorrows and troubles, and in every way made them feel that she was their true friend. That they learned to love her it is needless to state, and to the few Indians who remain the announcement of her death will be sorrowful news. They frequently made visits to her during her life and always looked up to her as a guiding genius.

The Indians were not alone, however, in being the recipients of her kind attentions and bounty. Like her noble husband she was of an open, frank, charitable and generous nature, and the sufferings and sorrows of others never appealed in vain to her sensitive heart. To the women who came after her and settled with their husbands and families around her cabin she was frequently a friend in need, teaching how best to provide against the hardships of pioneer life and rendering them every assistance that could be suggested to a kind and charitable nature. Many incidents of deep interest connected with her early life here might be related did not lack of space forbid.

Her late husband, Alexis Coquillard, who has gone into history among other great pioneers of this country, was also a native of Detroit, born in September, 1795. In 1855 he received a fall while inspecting his flouring mill that had been burned and died from its effects, aged sixty years. At the early age of seventeen he undertook the hazardous task of carrying the mail to and from Gen. Harrison's army, and succeeded so well that Gen. Harrison personally praised him for his courage, adroitness and powers of endurance. At twenty he became a trader with the Indians in the St. Joseph river country, as agent of the American Fur Company, and succeeded so well that in 1832 he in company with Francis Comparet bought the company's business in this section, Mr. Comparet taking charge of the post at Fort Wayne and Mr. Coquillard here. In 1839, in company with the late Dr. J. A. Hendricks and John Rush, he built the first flouring mill here. He took great interest in public enterprises and encouraged every move toward the growth and prosperity of the place. He was generous almost to a fault, brave as a lion, knowing absolutely nothing of fear, and possessed a thorough knowledge of Indian character and languages, as did also his wife. His funeral was one of the most imposing in the history of the city, and his remains lie in the family vault under the chapel at Notre Dame, where the companion of his life has been laid beside him.

One son, Alexis Theodore, was born to this remarkable couple, and survives them with one son, Alexis Charles. Another, Miss M. T. Rousseau, who had lived with the deceased since childhood joins these two and a large circle of relatives and friends in mourning the death of one whom all loved and revered.

The funeral occurred at 10 o'clock this morning, at Notre Dame, and the remains were interred in the family vault beneath the chapel. Very Rev. E. Sorin, superior general, preached the funeral sermon.

LOVE'S YOUNG DREAM.

MARION, Ind., September 22.—One of the most romantic affairs ever heard of in this section of the country first took place about two weeks ago here, and terminated last night. The substance of the case is as follows: About three miles in the country lives a well-to-do farmer named Fauster, who has in his family a daughter, named Sarah D., aged just fourteen, who is small in stature for her age and is merely a child. Another old farmer named Pritchett is a close neighbor, who has a son just thirteen years of age, who is dubbed as Morton. About two weeks ago these small children planned an elopement and succeeded in leaving the paternal roof safely. After leaving their homes they walked to Wabash, a distance of twenty miles, where they took the train for White Pigeon, Mich. After arriving there they were united in marriage by the proper person. This pair then roamed over several towns in the state on their wedding trip, until their finances became short, when they returned home, last week, and told their respective parents of their adventure. The father of the girl became indignant, and brought the girl to town last Saturday, before Squire Timony, where a warrant was issued charging Morton Pritchett's father with abduction. The case was tried yesterday, when he was acquitted, the girl acknowledging she persuaded the youth to elope with her, and furnished part of the money, the cost of the whole trip being $10.25. While on the trip and after they were married neither occupied the same bed, and no change of clothing was taken along for the occasion. After the trial each returned to their respective homes, where they still remain. The father of the girl will immediately institute proceeding to have the marriage set aside, the plea to be not old enough. The affair has caused considerable interest, and every one who is acquainted with the particulars takes an interest in the case. During the trial several funny incidents were told by each, which the jammed court-room relished with pleasure. The end is not yet, as bad blood is brewing between the two parents.

The True Story of William Tell.

He was captain of an archery club, and one of the best shots with the bow and arrow in all Switzerland. The country was then under the rule of the tyrant Gesler. One day Gesler set his plug hat on a pole for men to salute and ordered that every man in Altorf should make obedience to it or die. And they did every man of them. Even the trees standing around made their best boughs. Finally Bill Tell came along, with his little boy. He told the men of Altorf that before he would bow to Gesler's hat he would 'Altorf and stamp on it. That was the kind of a bow and arrow he was. Gesler arrested him on the spot, being marshal of the village as well as a tyrant, thus drawing a salary from two offices, contrary to the constitution. Gesler, as a punishment for his audacity, ordered him to shoot an apple off the head of his boy. This he did, although it was an arrow escape for the young Tell. The apple fell, pierced to the core, no encore being allowed, owing to the extreme length of the performance. As Tell rushed forward to embrace his boy, another arrow dropped out of his vest. "Ha!" cried the tyrant, "wherefore concealest that arrow?" Replied Tell, pointing to Gesler's head-gear on top of the pole. "To shoot that hat!" The joke was so good that Gesler released him, and gave him a $20 gold piece.[—Cincinnati Saturday Night.

Hedging on His Bet.

[Detroit Free Press.]

A Citizen without an umbrella was stowed away in a doorway on Griswold street, yesterday afternoon, when a stranger came along and turned in with him and asked:

"Do you ever bet?"

"Well, sometimes," was the reply.

"Do you want to bet with me?"

"Perhaps. State your proposition."

"You see, I don't belong to any political party in particulra, but whoop around on my own hook. A spell ago I made a bet of $5 that Indiana would go democratic. Then I made another that Ohio would go republican. Then I turned to and bet that Maine would go for the fusionists. See?"

"Yes, I see."

"Well, now I want to hedge, and I'll bet you $25 that the verdict of the coroner's jury in the case of Cain and Able would be that Able fell down a hatchway and broke his neck. Come, now, you dasn't bet."

The citizen blustered a little, but the sight of two tens and a five drove him out into the shower.

A Curious Calculation.

The London Medical Record says: "A curious and astounding calculation has been made by an American physician, Dr. Farrar. He estimates not less than half a ton of pure gold, worth a half million of dollars, is annually packed into people's teeth in the United States. At this rate all the gold in circulation will be buried in the earth in three hundred years. He also calculates that three millions of artificial teeth are annually supplied, and that only one person in eight has sound teeth."

A Popular and Reliable Company.

As to the soundness and standing of the Ohio Farmers' Insurance Company, the Indiana Farmer has the following editorial in the issue of May 22, 1880:

"Some of the foreign insurance companies are waging a war on the Ohio Farmers' Fire Insurance Company in this state, and report all manner of things about it. We had occasion to examine its reports and papers on file in the office of the Auditor of State this week, as well as those of other companies, and we found its affairs were frankly and freely open to the world, and that its condition compares favorably with other companies. We examined them with a view of ascertaining how much truth there was in statements of other and interested companies, and we believe that the company is sound, and does business safely. The fact that for 32 years it has promptly paid all losses, and accumulated nearly a million of capital besides, is a bit of practical experience in its favor that cannot be whistled down at a breath. It seems that the cause of the war and jealously is, that this company has become very popular among the farmers of the west, and taking no city or conflagration risks, can and does issue policies for less than the rates of some other companies."

The principal office of the company above named is located at Le Roy, Medina county, Ohio. Mr. C. G. Shepard is the soliciting agent for DeKalb county, Indiana and Defiance county, Ohio. For full particulars concerning the company, address F. M. Thompson, general agent, Hicksville, O. 21-tf

Importing Negro Votes Into Indiana.

[Cincinnati Commercial.]

CLEVELAND, O., Oct. 14:—E. V. Smalley of the New York Tribune is in the city, on the way east from Indiana, where he made a careful study of the campaign. In an interview with a Leader reporter, he stated that the republicans made more than 1,000 votes by colored importation.

A Valuable Man for the Government.

Mr. E. C. Allen, of Augusta, Maine, the story-paper, publisher, paid, the past year, for postage to the United States the large sum of $187,000, which is 1-300th of the entire expenses of the postoffice department of the United States. The Augusta postoffice has netted to the government the past year, a sum greater than the Brooklyn, N. Y. postoffice netted to the government.

ANOTHER EXPOSURE.

How One of the Leading Men of the North Takes the Cover Off of a Pretended "Outrage."

[Rochester Union and Advertiser.]

Among the southern papers that come to our table is the "Times," published at Florence, South Carolina. Its issue of a late date contained a leading editorial, occupying over three columns, in refutation of an alleged outrage said to have been perpetrated upon a northern man, one W. B. Bell, who claimed to be a traveling agent for Messrs. H. H. Warner & Co., of this city. The man Bell aforesaid wrote a scurrilous letter to the Lewiston (Mifflin county, Pa.,) "Gazette," while traveling and doing business at the south, in which he inveigled strongly and at length against southern law, southern actions and the southern people. Subsequently, on his return north, in an interview with a Pittsburgh, Pa., "Telegraph" reporter, gave a detailed account of an alleged "outrage" that had been perpetrated upon him immediately following the publication of this letter. In this interview he stated that he was beset by over one thousand men, driven into a corner, and only saved from lynching by the remarkable bravery he displayed. The editor of the Florence "Times" characterizes Bell's letter as a base fabrication, states that Bell had denied its authorship in Florence, and in strong terms denounced Bell as a base calumniator.

Yesterday a representative of the "Union" was dispatched to interview Mr. Warner and ascertain if he was in possession of the exact facts of the case, and if so what the facts are. He found Mr. Warner in his place of business, and after obtaining an audience inquired:

Reporter—Can you give me any information in regard to a man by the name of Bell, who reports himself as in your employ, and has been traveling through the south?

Mr. Warner—I have no such man in my employ now. He was dismissed some time since for reasons best known to myself.

R.—What was he doing while in your employ?

Mr. W.—Selling safes and advertising my safe kidney and liver cure and other remedies.

R.—Do you know anything about an outrage alleged to have been perpetrated upon him in South Carolina?

Mr. W.—Yes, I know about an alleged outrage, but I never have been able to learn of any real one.

R.—You think, then, that any statements this man Bell may have made regarding any outrage or ill-treatment at the south false?

Mr. W.—I do.

R.—On what do you base your opinion?

Mr. W.—First, my investigation of the case. After looking into the matter thoroughly, I became convinced that if Mr. Bell had received any rough usage it was his own fruit, and because he was in a condition which rendered him unfit to distinguish between hospitable and inhospitable treatment. My investigation convinced me that there was no public demonstration or mob at the time and place he mentions, and that any difficulty which may have occured was a personal brawl between himself and some other men, the same as is liable to occur on the streets of any city. In fact, I am convinced that the whole reported outrage was gotten up to cover private difficulty. Secondly, I have been selling my goods by traveling men for the last ten years, and keeping between fifty and one hundred men traveling through the south all the while except during the summer months. The treatment they have received has always been both kind and considerate, and such as has convinced me that southern hospitality is not a mere name, but a reality.

R.—How long was Bell in your employ?

Mr. W.—Between 30 and 60 days; wait a moment and I will give you the exact time.

R.—Never mind, that is near enough. Are your men still traveling through the south advertising your safe kidney and liver cure and selling safes?

Mr. W.—More extensively than ever before.

R.—Do they report any ill-treatment or animosity toward northern enterprises?

Mr. W.—On the contrary, my sales were never so great as at the present time, my men never received better treatment, and it is my opinion that the people of the south are as cool headed as any other community in any other part of the land.

From the above interview, it would seem that the statements made by the man Bell, are baseless fabrications, and on a par with similar stories which have been, and are, floating about the country. Mr. Warner is a gentleman whose standing in this community is second to none; and his extensive business specially fits him to speak with authority upon this subject, as his house has a larger force traveling through the south than any other institution in the country. His statement, both with regard to this particular specimen "outrage," and generally, will be accepted as conclusive wherever he is known.

Garfield Condemned by Himself—An Old Letter Unearthed, in Which He Favors Chinese Cheap Labor.

NEW YORK, Oct. 20.—The following was published in Truth this morning. The letter is authentic; it is in General Garfield's hand-writing; denial is worse than useless. It should have the widest circulation among all classes, as it unmasks the republican hollowness and hypocrisy on the labor question, through their chief:

GARFIELD'S DEATH WARRANT—HIS INFAMOUS LETTER ADVOCATING AN EXTENDED CHINESE IMMIGRATION—HE DECLARES HIMSELF ADVERSE TO THE LABORING MAN'S INTERESTS, AND IN FAVOR OF THE EMPLOYERS' UNION, ADVISING THEM TO EMPLOY THE CHEAPEST LABOR AVAILABLE.

[Personal and Confidential.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., Jan. 23, 1880.

H. L. Morey, Employers' Union Lynn, Mass.:

DEAR SIR:—Yours in relation to the Chinese problem came duly to hand. I take it that the question of employes is only a question of private and corporate economy, and individuals or companies have the right to buy labor where they can get it cheapest. We have a treaty with the Chinese government, which should be religiously kept until its provisions are abrogated by the action of the general government, and I am not prepared to say that it should be abrogated until our great manufacturing interests are conserved in the matter of labor. Very truly yours,

J. A. GARFIELD.

The original letter, of which the foregoing is a true copy, is in Truth's possession. It was mailed at Washington, by the republican candidate for president, to Henry Morey, a prominent member of the Employers' Union, Lynn, Mass. At his death, which recently occured, it was found among his effects. The envelope enclosing it, the original of which is also in Truth's possession, is marked "Personal," as carefully as the letter is marked "Personal and Confidential."

"A State for Sale."

The Philadelphia Times, under the heading of "A State for Sale," says: "They are about to have one of the liveliest political auctions in Nevada this year ever known even on the auction-ridden Pacific slope. Senator Sharon, one of the bonanza kings of California, concluded to take a flyer at statesmanship a few years ago, and when the Nevada senatorship was auctioned off in the regular way, he bought it and became a senator. In like manner Bullion Jones out-bid all competitors for the other seat, and all has gone along smoothly. Sharon has once in a while come on to Washington, been introduced to new senators, renewed his almost forgotten acquaintance with old members, drawn his pay, and then hurried back to his speculations at San Francisco, rarely ever even making a flying visit to the state he is presumed to represent in the senate. As he had bought and paid for his senatorship just as he bought his mining stocks and elegant residences of more than oriental splendor, nobody complained about Sharon forgetting to serve as senator, because it was generally assumed that he had a right to do with what was his own by purchase, pretty much as he pleased; and his re-election this year was commonly conceded, as he was believed to be without competing bidders for the place. But there are other bonanza kings in California, and they, like Sharon, weary of the monotony of gathering wealth by millions. Mr. Jas. G. Fair is one of these, and he can size up his bar'l with Sharon and outbid Sharon if necessary, and he has decided to attend the November auction to bid for himself. Fair is no more a democrat than Sharon is a republican, and neither has a political conviction beyond his immediate speculative interests; but as Sharon has to be a republican at present, Fair comes out a democrat, and he will contest Nevada for Hancock and Fair as Sharon must contest it for Garfield and Sharon. This conflict of the bullion kings unsettles Nevada not only for the senatorship, but it also unsettles the little pocket state for the presidency, as the vote of the state for both depends entirely upon the skill and cash of two men who are ready to fling a few millions over each other to win the prize."

The Democratic Party and the Revival of Business.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

The people of Indiana owe it to themselves to remember that in the darkest days of business prostration the democratic party, by every means in its power, worked with unflagging zeal to arrest the tidal-wave of bankruptcy that was sweeping over the land, with consequences the most disastrous that ever befel any country under heaven. Under republican rule contraction of the currency had gone forward—to an extent that business was prostrate from the center to the circumference of the Union. Industries were paralysed—men and women were idle, values were shrinking, and there was universal dismay. In saying this, we state what every intelligent citizen knows to be true. Something had to be done to remedy the evil. Appeals to the republican party were unheeded. Contraction went forward; failures multiplied; idleness increased; the army of tramps grew to more alarming proportions; fortunes melted away; homes and houses and lands were confiscated; the bankrupt courts were crowded with applicants, ready to surrender the remnant of their estates; sheriff's hammers were beating funeral marches as business men marched to their graves. The country was filled with gloom; and still the republican party pursued its crushing, devastating policy. The business men and the workingmen of Indiana, by every consideration of loyalty to the truth of history, should remember these things. In December, 1875, the lower house of congress passed under control of the democratic party. Then began a policy designed to remedy the difficulties which we have referred to. The first movement was to remonetize the silver dollar which the republican party, in the interest of the bondholders, had demonetized. This measure, designed to restore confidence, to help raise business from its prostrate condition, was opposed by republicans, and none were more hostile to it than James A. Garfield. He opposed it from first to last, and when the remonetization bill passed congress Rutherford B. Hayes vetoed it, but the measure was so manifestly in the interest of the country that congress passed the bill over the veto of the republican president, and it became the law of the land. Would Indianians to-day vote for the demonetization of the silver dollar? Directly, they would not. But in voting for James A. Garfield they do vote to demonetize the silver dollar, and as certain as the republican party gain control of congress, the silver dollar will disappear from the coins of the country. The policy of the republican party was to retire every dollar of the greenback currency. That it was not done is due to the fact that the democratic party had control of congress; and, as a result, the contraction of the currency to the extent of more than $346,000,000 was arrested. There is not an intelligent man in the state of Indiana who desires to see the greenback currency retired. Every business man knows full well that such a measure would prove suicidal; but with the republican party in power in congress, with a republican president to carry out its designs, the greenback currency and the silver dollars will disappear, and national bank bills will take their place. James A. Garfield is pledged to such a policy. The democratic party is pledged to let well enough alone. The position of the democratic party on financial questions is sharply defined. It is in the interest of the business welfare of the country, and the people of Indiana know the declaration to be true. Under democratic rule in congress the country has emerged from business prostration, and in so far as legislation can be said to have had any effect upon such questions the credit is entirely due to democratic policy.

A CENTENARIAN'S DEATH.

Tobacco Did It, But it Took 105 Years.

On the 14th of September Melohiah, a Choctaw squaw, died at her residence, near Hoyt City, Indian territory. According to the statement of her relatives she was 114 years old at the time of her death. When the Choctaws were moved to this country, in 1830, she claimed to be sixty-four years old, and had two great-grandchildren. She had lived for fifty years on the place where she died. She leaves a numerous family, consisting of five children, twenty-eight grandchildren, sixty-three great grandchildren and thirteen great-great-grandchildren. The principal causes of her untimely decease are attributed to her having taken a severe cold from exposure at the time of her removal to Hoyt City, in 1880, and to an inordinate use of tobacco, to which she had been addicted for 105 years.

Billy Williams on Free Trade.

As the republicans are howling about free trade, we give below an extract from a speech made by Billy Williams, the republican representative from this district, in congress, Jan. 29, 1870. Read it, workingmen, and then contrast it with the dirty lies now being peddled about by the republicans:

"The subject which I design at this time to discuss before the house is one involving no party or political feeling. It is a subject reaching far beyond any consideration of that kind. I speak to-day for the laboring agriculturists of the great west, who are unrepresented upon this floor. I speak upon a subject which is now exciting the interests of the whole population of this country from ocean to ocean. I speak in anticipation of the great battle which ere long is to be fought in this country between labor and combined monopolies—a battle, which in the importance of its results, is excelled only by the great battle which was fought in the mind of Milton between the archangels and the adversary of man. The question now to come before this country is whether its toiling millions, as the tax-gatherer pays his periodical visits, shall be borne down with oppression by these moneyed monopolies, and their earnings taken to fill the coffers of the aristocracy.

Mr. Speaker, the people, who make constitutions, who make presidents and congresses, are the sovereigns of our country, and their mandate has gone forth from the fields of the west that no moneyed monopolists or railroads kings of the east shall stand in the way of commerce, and, with kid-gloves and golden slippers, demand extortionate tribute for the transportation of her products to market, and then by a high protective tariff on the clothing worn by her women and children be required to contribute from the bone and muscle of her industry $100,000,000 per year to the support of the manufacturing interests of New England. Sir, what the west demands is equal protection. She asks nothing more. She will submit to nothing less. And as one of her representatives I warn you to-day that throughout her rich valleys and extensive plains the muttering of thunders of her people can be heard for free trade, which will continue in intensity if you refuse to protect her industries equally with others until there shall be written on your statute-book the memorable words addressed to Nebuchadnezzar: "Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin," which being interpreted will say to New England protectionists, "Thy tariff, on which thou hast grown rich, has departed from thee, and thy scepter of oppression, shall be given to free trade."

To Workingmen.

[New York Express.]

Republicans hope to elect Garfield by the coercion of workingmen. It is a favorite method of republican capitalists and employers. A committee of the United States senate found that thousands of operatives in New England manufactories and employes in work-shops were bulldozed to vote for republican candidates.

Already in Vermont, Maine, Ohio and Indianan republican employers have resorted to intimidation to compel their workmen to vote the republican ticket. Their only hope of electing their candidate is by fraud and force. And already they are beginning to crack their whips over the heads of their employes.

Northern workingmen are not slaves. They should resist and resent as an insult any attempt to coerce or intimidate them to vote any ticket whatever under any threat or influence. It is against our laws and a flagrant violation of the spirit of our institutions, to drive employes to the ballot-box by threats of any kind. The knout has no place in American politics.

Workingmen, you have tremendous interests at stake in this election. It is a crisis in the history of free institutions. Stand fast by your liberties. Maintain your manhood. Refuse to be bulldozed by anybody. And if any employer attempts to intimidate you by any threat whatever, direct or implied, to vote the republican ticket, report his name at once, and let it be held up to public execration. New York is not big enough to hold a white slave driver.

The November Battle.

(Philadelphia Times.)

No candidate ever appeared before the American people for their chief magistracy whose record was more blameless as soldier or patriot than General Hancock's, and the purity of his public and private life speaks trumpet-tongued in his behalf in the tempest of partisan debauchery that now shames the country. His name will arouse a degree of enthusiasm on the part of the democrats, that is not now expected by the republicans, who are already rejoicing over their assumed victory in November.

The south will cast 138 electoral votes for Hancock on the second of November. New York can be carried for Hancock against all the power and appliances of the republicans. New York and New Jersey would add forty-four electoral votes to the 138 of the south, leaving but three more to win to give Hancock the 185 requisite to an election. To gain the votes necessary to be added to New York and New Jersey, the democrats can make a hopeful battle in New Hampshire, Maine, Connecticut, Indiana, Colorado, Nevada and California, and they will give active employment to the republicans to hold their own in Illinois, Wisconsin and Pennsylvania.

THE EAST.

A PITTSBURGH dispatch reports that two more deaths have resulted from the collision on the Pennsylvania railroad, making thirty-two in all.... William C. Patterson, his wife and daughter-in-law, while out riding near North Newcastle, Me., were thrown from their carriage. Mr. Patterson was fatally injured, and the ladies received serious injuries which it is feared may prove fatal.... Returns from the New York Custom House show that the imports in September were larger than any previous month since September, 1879, and the exports were exceeded only by those of [illegible].

THE "Ladies' Deposit Bank," of Boston, an institution managed by women, and which has been paying enormous rates of interest, has collapsed, and turns out to have been a swindle of gigantic proportions. The liabilities amount to about $500,000, and poor women are the principal victims. The officers of the so-called bank, all of them women, have been arrested.

JOHN A. WOODWARD, cashier of the City Treasurer's office in Boston, has stolen $82,000 of the city's funds and absconded.

A PECULIARLY shocking tragedy is reported by telegraph from Wheelock, Vt. A man named Byron Blake murdered his mother, sister and stepfather with a knife, and then hung himself. The murderer was 26 years of age. He had six years ago a spinal difficulty, which occasioned the loss of reason. He was confined in an asylum two years, and when he returned home was considered safe, but was of ugly temper, as in fact he had always been. His mother was 63 years old, the stepfather 74 years.

PITTSBURGH is filled with strife over the admission of colored children to the public schools.... Several mills in Maine have been obliged to shut down for want of water.... Lydia Maria Child, the well-known American authoress, died, a few days ago, at Wayland, Mass. She was born at Medford, Mass., in 1802.... Merwin, Hulbert & Co., a New York firm dealing in arms and ammunition, have suspended, with liabilities estimated at $200,000 or more.

DETAILS of the triple murder and suicide near Wheelock, Vt., are so phenomenally horrible as to almost stagger belief in their authenticity. The maniac murderer and suicide was a young man named Blake, and his victims were his mother (Mrs. Williams), sister and stepfather. The account goes on to state that the murderer clubbed them all to death with a shot-gun, breaking the stock off on Mrs. Williams' head, the lock of the gun being found entangled in her hair. The stock lay by her side. The walls, curtains and mirror were bespattered with blood, and there is a hole made in the plastering of the ceiling by an up-stroke of the weapon. Some apples from hanging racks were scattered about the room. Part of Mrs. Williams' hair was pulled out, and it is supposed she started to escape and that he caught her by the hair and dragged her back. Though an extraordinarily strong woman, she was no match for the armed maniac. The old folks, being feeble, could make little resistance. The back of Mrs. Williams' head was pounded in, her teeth knocked out, and the skull broken in over the right eye, and her lips cut open. Mr. Parks' head was pounded up, one arm broken, and [illegible] the [illegible] broken. Mrs. Parks' head was crushed in the same as the others. The dead body of Blake was found in the barn suspended by the neck with a rein taken from some [illegible].

WILLIAM B. KINNEY, an old and well-known journalist of Newark, N. J., and Minister to Sardinia under President Fillmore, is dead.

THE WEST.

AN inch of snow fell at Sioux City, on the 16th inst.... The epizootic has appeared in Chicago in a mild form.... By the bursting of an affair called a "cooker," which is used in distilleries to steam corn before it is mashed, seven persons employed in Haas & Powell's distillery, in Chicago, were killed and four persons were seriously wounded.

GOV. PITKIN, of Colorado, has sent to Secretary Schurz a report of the circumstances of the killing of a Ute by Jackson, and of the subsequent capture of Jackson, while in custody, by the Indians. The United States Attorney at Denver has instructed the United States Commissioner to issue warrants for the arrest of Berry, the Indian Agent, and the others implicated in permitting Jackson's capture with a view to protecting them from the lynching which has been threatened. Gov. Pitkin objects to any interference by the Government in behalf of the Utes or of Berry. Berry has also forwarded a report, accusing Jackson of killing the Indian without provocation, and exculpating himself from the charge of permitting the Indians to capture Jackson.... Col. George Scroggs, late United States Consul at Hamburg, Germany, and proprietor of the Champaign (Ill.) Gazette, died of consumption at Denver, Col., last week, aged 38 years.

J. H. HAVERLY, the prince of managers, not satisfied with the already large number of irons he has in the fire, has heated a very large one in his latest—Haverly's Genuine Colored Minstrels, 100 in number, with twenty end men. This troupe is at his Chicago house this week. Manager Haverly is bound to lead the world in his old business of conducting a minstrel company.

A FIERCE railroad war has been raging between the main lines running southwest from Chicago. The trouble was inaugurated by a cut in passenger rates between that city and St. Louis on the part of the Wabash road. The Chicago and Alton at once assumed a belligerent attitude, and the cutting was kept up until fares between Chicago and St. Louis were reduced to nominally nothing, tickets being sold as low as 70 cents. Finally the Chicago, Rock Island and Pacific, and the Chicago, Burlington, and Quincy roads became involved in the struggle, and limited tickets between Chicago and Kansas City were sold for 50 cents over all four of the competing lines. Thousands of unlimited tickets between Chicago and Kansas City were sold for $6, and between Chicago and St. Louis for $5. The effect of the fight will be to permanently reduce rates between these points, and thus the people at least will be benefited by this fight.... The heaviest wind-storm experienced for many years prevailed throughout the Northwest on the 16th and 17th of October. The gale was particularly disastrous to shipping on the great lakes. Three or four vessels were wrecked in the vicinity of Chicago, and several lives were lost. Near the Manitou islands a barge, with all hands, was lost. In the vicinity of Sturgeon bay, on the west shore of Lake Michigan, an immense amount of damage was done to shipping, upward of twenty vessels having been blown ashore. Old sailors say it was the worst storm they ever saw on Lake Michigan. The gale also swept over Lakes Superior and Erie, but the damage was light compared with that done on Lake Michigan. The storm was very violent along the line of the Southern Minnesota railroad, in Minnesota. Trains were blockaded by snowdrifts ten to twelve feet deep, and the passengers were only kept from starving by the arrival of teams with provisions. Cattle, horses, and other farm animals have perished in large numbers. In the Elkhorn valley, Neb., snow drifted to the depth of eleven feet, and railroads and stage routes were blockaded.

BELOW is a list of the vessels reported lost during the heavy gale on Lake Michigan: Steamer Alpena, Chicago, Capt. Napier, seventy passengers and crew; schooner David A. Wells, Chicago, Capt. Thedkaus and crew; barge Florence Lester, officers and crew; schooner name unknown, Foscord, Wis., officers and crew; schooner, name unknown, Escanaba, officers and crew.... Several roads in the Northwest, including the Southern Minnesota, the Iowa division of the Milwaukee and St. Paul, and the St. Paul, Minneapolis and Manitoba, were blocked with snow and ice last week, and travel over them was suspended two or three days.

CHIEF JUSTICE EDWARD G. RYAN, of the Wisconsin State Supreme Court, whose health has long been critical, died at his home in Madison on the 19th of October. Justice Ryan was born at Newcastle House, in the county of Meath, Ireland, Nov. 13, 1810, and was consequently in his 70th year.

A TERRIBLY fatal accident occurred in the distillery of Cox & Fairbanks, at Terre Haute, Ind. From some unexplained cause three of the large boilers of the distillery exploded with frightful effect, partially demolishing the building and burying a number of workmen in the ruins, nine of them being taken out dead. Following are the names of the killed: Frank Stanley (engineer), William Kirtly, John Brooks, Joseph Denny, Howe Day, William Bergman, Henry Dinkle, Mike Kelly, and a stranger from Cincinnati, name unknown. In addition, eight persons were wounded, some of them dangerously. A large piece of one of the boilers fell into the cattle-pens and killed two of the steers. Another piece knocked out the end of the malt-house, 600 yards away.

IN Hereford county, Col., Antonio Mestes, a Mexican, murdered his wife and babe most horribly. He first knocked the woman down with a club and then seized a knife and with it savagely lacerated the lower portion of the woman's body, cutting out immense pieces of flesh. He then deliberately ripped open her womb and took the still-living child from it, which he dashed to the floor and stamped upon until life was extinct. After this he tore the body of his wife almost apart, and, after further mutilations, fled. He was found near his old home and placed in a school-house for safe keeping with a guard of men. It having become generally known that he had been overtaken, and his whereabouts being ascertained, a body of sixty men were soon got together, who marched to the school-house and, taking him out, proceeded to administer punishment to the man for his crimes. His body was mutilated in precisely the same manner as was his wife's by him. His scalp was then lifted, and a rope tied about the man's neck, the other end being attached to the horn of a saddle. He was then dragged about over the ground until his body was entirely unrecognizable.

A LOSS of $100,000 was sustained by the burning of the oil mill of Orr, Kendall & Co., at Piqua, Ohio.... Portage, Wis., suffered a loss of $50,000 from the burning of a business block. The tannery of Philbrook & Co., at Racine, was also destroyed by fire.... A national anti-horse-thief convention at Keokuk, Iowa, at which delegates were present from seven surrounding States, reveals the existence of a persuasive force of which the public have hitherto had but little knowledge.... A collision on the Cincinnati, Hamilton and Dayton railroad, fifteen miles from Cincinnati, resulted in every passenger in one of the coaches being more or less injured, some of them, it is feared, fatally.... A terrible accident is reported from Cincinnati. A fire broke out in the shoddy factory of Benjamin Hay, in that city. At the time twenty-eight persons, girls and women, were at work in the third story. The girls all made their escape, but five of the women were burned to death.

SITTING BULL has signified his willingness to surrender, but does not want the troops to move against him.... The National Grand Lodge of the Anti-Horse-Thief Association held its annual session at Keokuk, Iowa, last week. The order was organized in 1862, and has to-day a membership of 174 lodges, scattered throughout Iowa, Illinois, Missouri, Indiana, Arkansas, Kansas and Nebraska, and it is claimed has been of great benefit to the community.

A DISPATCH of Oct. 22, from Holland, Mich., says that six bodies from the wrecked steamer Alpena had been recovered, namely: F. Spaeth, of Grand Rapids; Mrs. Cole, of Muskegon; Mr. Crossman, of Grand Haven; Mr. Locke, of New York; a boy about 10 years old, and an unknown woman. A watch found on one of the bodies was found to have stopped at 10:30, and it is inferred from this that the ill-fated vessel went down at that hour on Sunday morning, Oct. 17. The wreck of the lost steamer is scattered along the eastern shore of Lake Michigan for a distance of seventy miles. It is the impression of experienced mariners that the vessel met her fate near the middle of the lake.

THERE was a twenty-mile race in Chicago between two equestriennes, Misses Pinneo and Jewett. The horse ridden by the former won in 56 minutes and 12 seconds.... A schoolboy of Cincinnati shot himself in the breast on account of being reprimanded for truancy.... George A. Wheeler went to a police station at San Francisco and stated that he had murdered his sister-in-law, Delia J. Tilison, and packed her body in a trunk. An investigation verified the truth of his statement, and he is now in jail.... J. H. Estabrook's livery stable, in Denver, Col., together with sixty head of horses and other contents, has been burned. Loss about $65,000; insurance, $8,000.... A family of emigrants, consisting of one man and two women, were found frozen to death near Springfield, Minn., from the effect of camping out in the late storm.... A fire at Mt. Vernon, Ind., destroyed $150,000 worth of business property.

WASHINGTON.

MR. BURCHARD, Director of the Mint, estimates the amount of gold coin in the country at $369,881,003, and the amount of silver at $149,799,335.

THE SOUTH.

THE cotton crop of the South will not be so good as it was thought it would be a month ago. In consequence of the moist weather the yield has suffered 8 per cent., but in any case the crop will be better than that of last year.

SAMUEL WATKINS, just deceased, left $180,000 to found a polytechnic institute in Nashville, Tenn.... James Ingram, aged 14, and Randolph Harris, aged 10, quarreled in Northampton county, N. C., and Ingram threw an ax at Harris, missing him. Harris retaliated by throwing an ax at Ingram, striking the latter in the forehead, splitting his skull, and killing him instantly.... A fire swept through the cotton-sheds of the Commercial Cotton Press and Wharf Company, at Charleston, S. C., consuming 2,000 bales of cotton and damaging property in the aggregate amounting to $200,000.

LATER reports of the fire at Charleston, S. C., place the loss at about $600,000. Two or three British steamships were ruined.

BY an accident to an excursion train on the Raleigh and Gaston railroad, near Youngsville, N. C., three colored men were killed, and fifteen other passengers, nearly all of them colored, were injured.

MAJ. THOMAS L. BUTLER, of Louisville, Ky., an aid-de-camp to Gen. Jackson in the war of 1812, is dead.... Four illicit distilleries, 600 gallons of moonshine whisky, and 5,000 gallons of mash and beer have been destroyed in the Atlanta (Ga.) revenue district.... In Jackson county, Ky., four illicit [illegible] [illegible] by James Abrams, a fight occurred between Abrams, his sons, and other parties on the one side, and William and James Radcliffe on the other. James Radcliffe was shot in the face and instantly killed. His brother John was shot in the side and mortally wounded. One of Abrams' sons was struck on the head with a rock, and it is said that he will die from the effects of the wound. The affair was the result of an old grudge.

POLITICAL.

THE Oregon Legislature, by a vote of 53 to 36, has passed a resolution in favor of submitting to the people of the State an amendment favoring woman suffrage.... A Democratic procession was fired into at Wilmington, Del., and six of those who were parading were seriously wounded, two fatally. The building from which the shots were fired was gutted, and several of the parties who fired the shots were very seriously wounded....

SOME sharp personal correspondence between Wade Hampton and Secretary Sherman has been given to the public. The correspondence grew out of a political speech by Sherman, in which he referred to Hampton and the Ku-Klux. Sherman, in reply to a letter from Hampton, acknowledges having used the language which offended the South Carolina Senator, reiterates it, and adds a good deal more of the same sort. Hampton rejoins, accusing Sherman of uttering what he knew to be false, and closes by stating that his address is Columbia, S. C.

JUDGE EDMUNDS has been re-elected to the Senate of the United States for a term of six years from the 4th of March next.

On account of the Socialist agitation and the dangerous character of the doctrines put forward by that organization, the cities of Hamburg, Altona, Ottonson, and Wandsbeck, in Prussia, where the Socialists are most numerous, will be declared in a state of siege.... It is said the British Government has made all its preparations for the prosecution of thirteen of the leading members of the Land League, and it is generally believed that Mr. Parnell is among the number.

THE OCTOBER ELECTIONS.

Indiana.

INDIANAPOLIS, Oct. 16.

Returns from all the counties in the State, except Ripley, give Porter 6,894 plurality. Ripley gave a Democratic majority in 1876 of 225. Full returns from the Fifth Congressional district give C. C. Watson, Democrat, 881 majority, leaving the Congressional delegation eight Republicans and five Democrats.

Ohio.

COLUMBUS, Oct. 16.

Unofficial returns have now been received from all the counties of Ohio, which show that Townsend's majority for Secretary of State is 18,998. The average majority for all other candidates on the Republican ticket will be fully 20,000.

INDIANA NEWS.

FARMERS all over Southern Indiana are buying bone-dust and removing it to their places. The bone-dust trade of New Albany is one of some magnitude.

THE wife of Michael Hazzard, of Little York, Washington county, gave birth to five children—four boys and one girl. The girl and two of the boys have since died. The other two were, at last accounts, all right.

COL. MILES MURPHY, an old citizen of New Castle, and his wife Elizabeth, have celebrated their golden wedding, having been married October 10, 1830. A large number of friends called to tender their congratulations.

A BOY in Richmond loaded a wooden cannon with rifle powder, and fired a salute in honor of Gen. Hancock. When the smoke cleared away he was found in a wash-tub near by, with his front teeth gone, his chin cut, and his face filled with powder.

THE son of D. S. Klingerman, two miles north of Bourbon, Marshall county, was instantly killed by his team running against a tree in an orchard, the tongue of the wagon pinning him to the tree. He was standing at the head of the horses when they became frightened.

DR. JOHN RICHARDSON, one of the oldest and most respected physicians of Delphi, is dead. The doctor had considerable reputation as a politician, having served one or two terms in the Indiana Legislature. He also filled for a term of years an important position in the State Insane Asylum, being Medical Director.

A VERY old lady named Mrs. Coons, of Bartholomew county, received a visit from an old gentleman of Michigan, aged 84 years, last week. Imagine her astonishment when he told her that his name was Ephraim Allen, her own brother, whom she had not heard of for forty-eight years, and supposed long since dead.

A BOX containing 112 pounds of dynamite, which must have cost $200, was found above the State dam across the Wabash at Pittsburgh, Carroll county, with two partly-burned fuses attached. It was probably placed there by farmers whose lands are subject to overflow. The dam is the largest and most expensive structure of the kind in the State.

JONATHAN CLEVENGER, residing at Johnson's Station, went to Spartansburg to witness a political demonstration, and when night came on he hitched up and drove home. Next morning he discovered that instead of his own horse he had driven home an old mule and express wagon. The other party to the swap had not been found at last accounts.

THE most horrible murder ever perpetrated in Boone county was committed at Milledgeville, a small town about four miles south of Lebanon. The circumstances are about as follows: Wm. Toney, an old man 92 years of age, living with his second wife, some two years ago had a difficulty with his step-son-in-law, Charles Allen, against whom he made an affidavit for assault and battery, by reason of which Allen was lodged in jail for several weeks. At the time, and frequently since, he has been heard to threaten Toney and all others concerned with his prosecution. One evening last week, while the family were at supper, the old man heard the dog barking in the yard and went to his front door to ascertain the cause. He had just opened the door and stepped out on the steps when a shot was heard by the family and others in the road. The old man was found to be shot with a rifle-ball in the stomach, the ball having passed entirely through him. He only spoke a few words and died within thirty minutes after the shooting. Just after the shooting Charles Allen was met coming from Toney's house with a rifle in his hands. He said he had done the shooting in self-defense, and passed on. As soon as the extent of the injury was ascertained parties were sent out to search for Allen, who had, in the excitement, fled to the woods. He was seen early in the morning trying to sneak from the woods to his father's house, when the constables took after him and succeeded in capturing him.

Vegetine.

More to Me than Gold.

WALPOLE, Mass., March 7, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS: [illegible] I have been troubled with Scrofulous Humor for more than thirty years, in my limbs and other parts of my body, and have had a great sufferer. [illegible] taking VEGETINE one year ago last August, and can truly say it has done more for me than any other medicine. [illegible] I would not be without this medicine—tis more to me than gold—and I feel it will prove a blessing to others as it has to me.

Yours, most respectfully,

MRS. DAVID CLARK.

J. BENTLEY, M.D., says:

It has done more good than all Medical Treatment.

NEWMARKET, Ont., Feb. 5, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS, Boston, Mass.:

Sir—I have sold during the past year a considerable quantity of your VEGETINE, and I believe in all cases it has given satisfaction. In one case, a delicate young lady of about seventeen years was much benefited by its use. [illegible] more good than all the medical treatment to which she had previously been subjected.

Yours respectfully,

J. BENTLEY, M. D.

Loudly in its Praise.

TORONTO, Ont., March 3, 1880.

Dear Sir—Considering the short time that VEGETINE has been before the public here, it sells well as a blood purifier, and for troubles of [illegible] stomach or torpid liver it is a first-class medicine. Our customers speak loudly in its praise.

THE SOLID SOUTH.

Nine Southern Governors Unitedly Indorse Gen. Hancock's Declaration Against Southern Claims—"No Legislation in any Way Providing for the Consideration or Payment of Such Claims Ought to be Approved by the President."

[From the New York World.]

On the 28th of September last the editor of the World addressed the following letter to each of the Governors of the States which, taken together, make up what it has become the fashion to call the "Solid South:"

SEPTEMBER 28, 1880.

MY DEAR SIR: I take the liberty of asking your co-operation in a measure which cannot fail, I think, at this stage of the campaign, to be of great and immediate benefit to the constitutional cause. The letter of Gen. Hancock, which I inclose, has had a most beneficial effect throughout the North and West—so beneficial, indeed, that the radicals are trying everywhere to counteract it by asserting that he will not be supported by the Southern people in the position which he has taken. Absurd as we know this assertion to be, it has some effect, not only upon the ignorant and prejudiced members of the radical party, but even, I am sorry to say, upon men who ought to know better. This being the case, it has occurred to me that a brief and outspoken indorsement of Gen. Hancock's position in regard to these alleged "rebel claims" by the leading men of the South would have a most important effect on public feeling just now. May I ask you, therefore, on receiving this letter, to telegraph to me, as early as possible, authority to sign in your behalf the following brief statement:

"The undersigned cordially agrees with the Democratic candidate for the Presidency that 'no legislation providing for the consideration or payment of claims of any kind for losses or damages by persons who were in rebellion, whether pardoned or not,' ought to be approved by him if elected to the Presidency."

To this letter the following replies have already been received from the Governors of North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, Texas and Tennessee. The Governors of Florida, Virginia and West Virginia being now absent from their homes, their replies will be published when received. Gov. Hamilton and ex-Gov. Carroll, of Maryland, the Senator Whyte, of the same State, an excellent letter from whom we append below, have cordially indorsed in like manner the letter of Gen. Hancock, though Maryland is not, we suppose, included in the "solid South" by those who have originated and kept up the absurd bugbear which we now explode once for all:

COLUMBIA, S. C., Oct. 1, 1880.

To the Editor of the World, New York:

Your suggestion cordially approved. I entirely agree with the letter of Gen. Hancock on the subject of Southern claims of all sorts arising out of the war.

THOMAS B. JETER,
Governor of South Carolina.

I cordially agree with the letter of Gen. Hancock.

W. D. SIMPSON,
Ex-Governor of South Carolina.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Oct. 1, 1880.

The Democracy of Tennessee cordially and unanimously approve of the letter of Gen. Hancock concerning rebel claims.

ALBERT S. MARKS,
Governor of Tennessee.

JACKSON, MISS., Oct. 2, 1880.

I entirely agree with Gen. Hancock that no legislation favorable to Southern war claims should be approved by him as President.

J. M. STONE, Governor of Mississippi.

MONTGOMERY, ALA. Oct. 2, 1880.

The undersigned, Governor of Alabama, cordially agrees with Gen. Hancock that no Congress ought to enact and that no President ought to approve any legislation providing for the consideration or payment of any claims of any kind for losses or damage incurred or sustained in the war between the States by persons engaged in the attempted secession of the Southern States, or in the effort to establish and maintain the Confederate Government.

R. W. COBB.

RALEIGH, N. C., Oct. 2, 1880.

I cordially agree with Gen. Hancock that no legislation providing for the consideration of or payment of claims of any kind for losses or damages sustained by persons who were in rebellion, whether pardoned or not, ought to be approved by him as President.

THOMAS J. JARVIS,
Governor of North Carolina.

ATLANTA, GA., Oct. 2.

I cordially agree with the Democratic candidate for the Presidency on the subject of Southern claims arising out of the war between the States, that no legislation in any way providing for the consideration or payment of such claims ought to be approved by him as President.

ALFRED H. COLQUITT,
Governor of Georgia.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Oct. 2.

To the Editor of the World:

SIR: I have received your dispatch of yesterday alluding to letter not received. The position taken by Gen. Hancock on the question of Southern claims is eminently correct and is universally approved here. My views have been fully expressed in a letter published by you in the World of Friday, Oct. 1. I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

LOUIS A. WILTZ,
Governor of Louisiana.

AUSTIN, TEXAS, Oct. 7.

In answer I have to say that, so far as I know, the people of the South have never expected any Southern claims for damages and loss resulting from the late civil war to be paid. All that matter we consider to be settled. And so let it be!

O. M. ROBERTS,
Governor of Texas.

LITTLE ROCK, ARK., Oct. 7.

I cordially approve of the letter of Gen. Hancock in relation to Southern claims in any way arising out of the war between the States.

WILLIAM R. MILLER,
Governor of Arkansas.

In connection with these plain and emphatic statements of the Executives of the Southern States the World calls attention to the following not less plain and emphatic letters from leading Senators of the South:

ABINGDON, VA., Oct. 6.

To the Editor of the World:

SIR: Gen. Hancock's letter in regard to Southern war claims has my hearty approval.

JOHN W. JOHNSTON,
Senator from Virginia.

SUMTER, S. C., Oct. 4.

To the Editor of the World:

SIR: I most thoroughly and cordially approve of Gen. Hancock's letter in regard to Southern claims arising out of the war.

WADE HAMPTON,
Senator from South Carolina.

EDGEFIELD, S. C., Oct. 5, 1880.

To the Editor of the World:

SIR: Gov. Hampton has conveyed to me your desire to know my opinion of Gen. Hancock's position on "Southern war claims," as expressed in his letter of a recent date. I was in hopes that the attitude of Southern Democrats generally toward this Republican bugaboo and the intelligence of the Northern Republicans would have made such an inquiry unnecessary. My information upon the subject of "Southern war claims" is that, in the flush times of Republican supremacy, the only people who made anything out of them were Republican claims brokers, who plied their avocation at the Treasury Department, and Republican officials in the Treasury Department, who were bribed by the brokers to pay them. Loyalty was supposed to be behind the hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of these so-called claims paid by Republican administrations, but there was generally about as much loyalty to sustain them as there was merit, and very small measure of either. I think Gen. Hancock in his letter has expressed the sentiments of nine-tenths of the men of the South, and it has my hearty approbation. Southern men know what war means. They know what defeat means, and they appreciate the consequences of defeat. They have no idea of making a raid on the treasury to pay "Southern war claims," or for any other purpose, and, what is more, they do not intend, as far as they can prevent it, to permit Republican "bummers" to do so. Perhaps it is the knowledge of this latter fact that brings so many tears of apprehension from the souls of the Stalwarts.

It is only necessary to refer to the files of the Democratic Congress to ascertain with what emphasis so-called "Southern war claims" have been condemned. A Democratic committee of a Democratic House at its last session buried scores of these "claims" in the "tomb of the Capulets," and many of the adverse reports were made by Southern men. Refer our stalwart friends to these adverse reports by way of quieting their apprehensions. Very truly yours,

M. C. BUTLER,
Senator from South Carolina.

NASHVILLE, TENN., Oct. 6.

To the Editor of The World:

SIR: I fully and heartily approve, in all its parts, of the manly letter of Gen. Hancock on the subject of Southern claims. The notion that the Government could ever put a premium upon acts menacing its own existence has never obtained a place in the minds of Southern Democrats. If such claims have ever threatened the treasury it has been under Republican policy and invited by Republican corruption and abuses. To single out individuals for payment out of the universal loss and wreck would nowhere be more unpopular than in the South. The masses of the Southern people are repairing the waste of the war, and the worse waste of misrule and of a narrow sectional policy. They are doing this by their own industry. Of the Government they ask only equal laws and a broad national policy.

JAMES E. BAILEY,
Senator from Tennessee.

BALTIMORE, Oct. 5, 1880.

To the Editor of The World:

SIR: I have given Gen. Hancock's letter on "Rebel Claims" my warmest approval, as you will see from the report of my speech in Philadelphia on the 2d inst., which is inclosed. Yours truly,

WM. PINCKNEY WHYTE,
Senator from Maryland.

BUSINESS.

An Undeceived by Real Business Men—Is Garfield the Only Man Who Can Save the Country?—And Is the Republican the Only Party Worthy of Confidence?—Here Are Some Actual Business Men Who Answer Both Questions Decidedly in the Negative.

The following address, signed by Levi Z. Leiter, of Field, Leiter & Co., Chas. Gossage, of Charles Gossage & Co., the two great dry-goods houses of the Northwest; Cyrus H. McCormick, of the McCormick Harvesting Machine Company; J. V. Clark, President of the Hibernian National Bank; Robert Law, the great coal merchant; Clinton Briggs, of the Crescent flour-mills; W. C. D. Grannis, wholesale grocer; B. Loewenthal, President of the International Bank; J. H. Prentiss, of Charles P. Kellogg & Co., and H. A. Kohn, of H. A. Kohn & Co., two of the largest wholesale clothing-houses in the United States; John R. Walsh, of the Western News Company; Potter Palmer, of the Palmer House; Conrad Seipp, proprietor of the mammoth Seipp brewery; John W. Doane, of J. W. Doane & Co., J. K. Fisher, Francis B. Peabody, Best, Russell & Co., and other leading bankers, manufacturers, merchants and capitalists of Chicago, was printed in a late issue of the Chicago Times:

TO THE PEOPLE: A studious effort is being made to create an impression in financial, mercantile and industrial circles in Chicago and elsewhere that a change in the administration of the General Government, by transferring its powers and duties from one of the two great political parties to the other, will check reviving confidence and prosperity, and bring untold financial disaster upon the country. This statement is so often repeated on the hustings and in the partisan press as to lead some thinking persons to believe that those who use this argument in behalf of the election of their candidate entertain a very contemptible opinion of the average intelligence of the business classes of the country. It is certainly an insult to their common sense to suppose that they can be made to believe that the Government is so weak that the mere transfer of power from one party to the other can have any such effect upon the business interests of the country. It is equally presumptuous to claim that the era of prosperity now opening throughout the land, from its center to its remotest extremities, is attributable exclusively to the Republican party, and the wisdom and purity of its several administrations. On the contrary, it is a historical fact that the worst and longest period of bankruptcy that has ever been experienced in the United States has occurred during the administration of the Government by the party now possessing its reins. Thousands of merchants who had passed unscathed through all previous panics went down in the crash of the last seven years, and their estates passed through the bankruptcy courts.

Every merchant knows the general causes which brought about this dire condition of things. General extravagance was a prominent one. The chronic condition of poverty and distress in the South, continued and aggravated by local bad government and the diligent cultivation of hostility toward that section by venomous and unscrupulous politicians, whose continuance in power depends upon keeping up such feeling in the North, was another. Widespread corruption in some of the departments of the General Government, especially in the bureau for the collection of internal revenue, which led to the debauchment of the public morals, was a third.

The causes which have contributed most largely to restoration of confidence in business and the starting up of another career of prosperity are, in the first place, the general economy and industry, following the period of extravagance, imposed upon and practised by the people, as evidenced, in part, by the large excess of exports over imports for the last five years. Secondly, the abundant crops with which kind nature has responded for several years past, wherever the soil has been tickled by the farmer; and the general failure of the crops in Europe, which created an immense demand for our cereals and provisions of every kind, and brought us in return an abundance of gold. The prosecution and conviction in the courts of law of dishonest officials and other revenue rogues, thus restoring, in part, a healthy tone in the administration of one of the important branches of government, which had been partially paralyzed for years; and, lastly, the restoration of honest local government in the Southern States, which has enabled the people occupying those States to go to work, without disturbance from without or within, and raise in the past two years the largest crops ever known in the history of cotton-growing; and thus the immediate fruit of the conciliatory policy latterly adopted toward the South, and which policy is directly in harmony with that declared by Hancock and his supporters, has been not only to stimulate industry immensely down there, but to open once more another and very valuable market for the country, and especially for the Northwest, which is thereby adding every day to its wealth.

Hence the claim that the country owes its prosperity to the party in power, or that it will go to ruin if that party is turned out of power, is an invidious one, and an insult to the intelligence of every business man.

It is the opinion of the undersigned, in common, as they believe, with a majority of the American people, that a change of administration is desirable after the lapse of twenty years, even were the party wielding the powers of the Government less guilty of faults than the party now in possession appears to be. It is time to take an account of stock by agents who have not been handling the trust many years.

GEN. SICKLES ON HANCOCK.

A Clear Presentation of the Issues of the Canvass—The Southern Claims Bugaboo.

W. A. Fowler, Esq., Chairman Executive Committee, St. James Hotel:

DEAR SIR: Business engagements that cannot be deferred will occupy my time during the next fortnight, so that I am unable to make such appointments for public meetings as you propose. My impressions about the present canvass have been freely expressed to my friends, and may be summed up in a few paragraphs.

I have always felt that whenever the Democratic party—North and South—frankly accepted the results of the war and nominated a candidate for President who was a firm and steady friend of the Union throughout the struggle, I could then, as a war Democrat, honorably resume my former political relations. The nomination of Hancock, one of the most distinguished leaders of the Union armies; his affirmation of the inviolability of the war amendments to the constitution; his denunciation of the unlawfulness of all reclamations set up by those who took part in the rebellion; the general favor his nomination has received in the Southern States—the "solid" support of the South given to a Union soldier—remove the causes which have for some time alienated me from my old political associates. I shall cheerfully unite with them now to promote the election of their worthy candidate.

The people do not sympathize with the struggle of the leaders of the Republican party to perpetuate their power. The earnestness of Lincoln, the strength of Seward, the enthusiasm of Sumner, the energy of Stanton are followed by the rivalries, jealousies and intrigues exhibited in the Chicago Convention. The patriotic zeal which animated these great men of the Republican party of the past seemed to have degenerated in their successors to a mere strife for patronage and place, and days were spent in bitter contention about candidates without presenting to the country any issue having a practical bearing on its welfare. The paramount question to be settled by the leaders at Chicago seemed to be the order of their succession to the Presidency.

It is desirable that the inevitable change in the political control of the Government, which is no doubt imminent, shall take place under safe conditions. It is not to be supposed that any party can hold power indefinitely. The examples of our own and other countries show that an alternation of parties every few years is to be anticipated, and experience proves these periodical transitions to be wholesome and useful. Democratic control can be safely tried with Hancock. He will give us all the advantages without any of the risks of a change of administration.

Republicans and Democrats who united with so much satisfaction in electing Gen. Grant do not seriously doubt the fitness of a soldier to fill the Presidential chair. The supporters of Gen. Hayes and the party that has now nominated Gen. Garfield and Gen. Arthur must have confidence in military men, unless it be suggested that neither Garfield nor Arthur have seen enough service to imperil our institutions by their martial proclivities. The country was never more fortunate than in the election of Gen. Jackson, the champion of the Union and of a sound currency, and of the independence of the Government from corporations, and who raised our young republic to the highest plane of national dignity and strength. Grant and Hayes and Garfield belonged to the gallant armies of the West. It is time that the army of the Potomac—the victors of Antietam, Gettysburg, Spottsylvania and Richmond—should be remembered in the person of one of its greatest commanders.

Five million votes will be cast for Gen. Hancock. He will have the suffrages of a considerable and influential part of the population of every State in the Union. And although the greater portion of his votes will come from the North and East and West, it will represent in the aggregate every section and interest of a reunited country as they have not been represented by any Executive since the war. All parts of the Union should share the prosperity we now enjoy. There is no doubt that the political agitation in the South, growing out of apprehended interference in their local government, and absorbing the attention of the Southern people during the past fifteen years, has seriously retarded improvement in their condition. All such fears would be tranquilized by four years of Hancock's conservative administration, and a general revival of enterprise, activity and thrift would be seen throughout the new South—the South of 1880—greatly to the advantage of the whole country.

The North means to hold fast to the results of the war. These are embodied in the recent amendments to the constitution. Gen. Hancock declares them to be inviolable. The South says, Amen. So be it. Let us make this a compact by electing Hancock, and so put an end to all further controversy about the fundamental questions settled by the war of secession. Let the decree be written in Hancock's own words: "When rebellion was crushed the heresy of secession in every form and in every incident went down forever. It is a thing of the dead past."

Neither party proposes any essential modification of the existing laws which have any relation to our present prosperity. In the manufacturing States both parties sustain a protective tariff. Louisiana has her sugar interests, Vermont and California their wool, Georgia and South Carolina their rice, Pennsylvania her iron and coal, and indeed all the States have industries which thrive with the help of a protective tariff. Economical questions are not among the issues of this canvass. Republicans and Democrats are Greenbackers to the extent of $350,000,000 in Government paper now issued—no doubt Mr. Weaver would issue more, but it is not probable that any administration will issue less. Millions of silver, not used as currency, are accumulating in the treasury. No administration will stop this coinage. Both parties are divided in opinion as to the best course of policy to pursue toward the national banks, yet neither will disturb the present system. Mr. Bayard, the Chairman of the Finance Committee of the Senate, is a hard-money man. Mr. Kelley, of Philadelphia, is a Republican-Greenback member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House of Representatives. Cameron and Wallace, the Senators from Pennsylvania (one a Democrat and the other a Republican), differ about most political questions, but they always unite in voting for a protective tariff. Mr. Randall, the Speaker of the present Democratic House, is a tariff man. Of the three principal Republican journals of this city, two disapprove the existing tariff and one adheres to a traditional support of the protective policy. We may, therefore, safely assume that, as our prosperity is not the offspring of either party, the success of one or the other candidate for the Presidency will have no influence on the causes that must augment our resources while we happily enjoy abundant harvests, sell our products at home and abroad and save a part of our income.

All we need in the Executive is an honest and intelligent administration of the Government. It is a mistake to suppose that Gen. Hancock is without preparation or experience to qualify him for executive duties. No man without administrative ability can successfully fill the great military offices Gen. Hancock has held during the past eighteen years. His present military jurisdiction embraces seventeen States—from Maine to Louisiana—and, whether commanding large forces in the field or dealing with the difficult questions incident to reconstruction in the South, or in restoring tranquillity to Pennsylvania, overrun by mobs and disturbed by riots, he has always shown the discrimination, discretion and tact which point out the man of executive capacity. At least it may be said that a stainless and successful career in the army affords as many guarantees for the faithful discharge of the functions of a chief magistrate as can be found in a long period of service in Congress, with its many temptations and frequent complications with the interests of corporations, contractors and jobbers. I am, sir, very respectfully,

D. E. SICKLES.

14 FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

"LET US HAVE PEACE."

Grant the Citizen Versus Grant the Partisan.

[From the Philadelphia Times.]

There are many intelligent citizens of all parties in the country who would regretfully accept the belief that Gen. Grant is, after all his opportunities and distinction, no more than the flexible politician, who can change his opinions on great public questions with every presumed party necessity or every dictate of ambition. The whole nation heard his appeals for and assurances of sectional peace only a few months ago, when he returned from a protracted journey in the South, and the nation will now read with profound regret his awkward and positive contradiction of himself. How Grant, the thoughtful and fearless patriot, answers Grant, the facile politician, may be seen by the following:

Grant's Speech at Bloomington, Ill., April 17, 1880.	Grant's Speech at Warren, Sept. 28, 1880.
It may be appropriate on this occasion to refer to my trip through the Southern States, and to what I have seen while traveling. I have been gratified at my reception in all the recently rebellious States. I passed from Philadelphia to Florida on my way to Havana, and on my return came via Texas from Mexico, thus passing through all the rebellious states, and it will be agreeable to all to know that hospitality was tendered me at every city through which I passed, and accepted in nearly all of them by me. The same decorations were seen in every State that are seen here to-night. The Union flag floated over us everywhere, and the eyes of the people in those States are as familiar with its colors as yours, and look upon it as guaranteeing to them all the rights and privileges of a free people, without regard to race, color, or previous condition of servitude. In most of the States, upon the reception committees, side by side were men that wore the blue and men that wore the gray, and reception addresses were made in part by those who wore the blue and those who wore the gray. We have no reason to doubt that those who wore the gray will fulfill all they have promised in loyalty to the flag and to the nation.	I am a Republican, as the two great political parties are now divided, because the Republican party is a national party, seeking the greatest good for the greatest number of citizens. There is not a precinct in this vast nation where a Democrat cannot cast his ballot and have it counted as cast. No matter what the prominence of the opposite party he can proclaim his political opinions, even if he is only one among a thousand, without fear and without proscription on account of his opinions. There are fourteen States and localities in some other States where Republicans have not this privilege. This is the reason why I am a Republican. But I am a Republican for many other reasons. The Republican party assures protection to life and property; the public credit and the payment of the debts of the Government, State, county or municipality, so far as it can control. The Democratic party does not promise this. If it does it has broken its promises to the extent of hundreds of millions, as many Northern Democrats can testify to their sorrow.

Nor was Gen. Grant alone in his party in declaring the madness of sectional strife a few months ago. Gen. Garfield, whose election to the Presidency Grant ostensibly proposed to advance by his Warren speech, thus spoke to the nation in the present Congress, when there were no Presidential necessities to cloud his patriotism and statesmanship:

> So far as I have studied the current of public thought and of political feeling in this country, no feeling has shown itself more strongly than the tendency of the public mind in the past few months. The man who attempts to get up a political excitement in this country on the old sectional issues will find himself without a party and without support. The man who wants to serve his country must put himself in the line of its leading thought, and that is the restoration of business, trade, commerce, industry, sound political economy, hard money and honest payment of all obligations; and the man who can add anything in the direction of the accomplishment of any of these purposes is a public benefactor.

That Gen. Grant told the truth at Bloomington in April last, and that Gen. Garfield uttered the sincere belief of himself and of the country on the floor of Congress, is not doubted by any intelligent citizen. Why, then, must both assail themselves, dispute their own honest convictions, and declare their own teachings to be false, in the heat of a great partisan struggle?

INTIMIDATION.

How Democratic Workmen Are Being Bulldozed by Eastern Manufacturers.

[Philadelphia Cor. Cincinnati Enquirer.]

A wholesale plan of intimidation is in operation in this city among the manufacturers—many of whom depend on the South as a market for their goods, by which their employes are given to understand that their situations are at stake unless they vote for Garfield. Mills have been canvassed in some instances by authority of the proprietors, ostensibly for the sole purpose of making sure that all the hands would be duly provided with naturalization papers and tax-receipts, and this proceeding alone has been regarded by Democratic employes as signifying that if they set any value to their situations they would be expected to support the ticket of their political opponents.

John Hackett, a foreman in Baeder, Adamson & Co.'s glue-works, has hired Democrats on condition that they vote the whole Republican ticket, has threatened the discharge of every man who brings "D——d Democratic pamphlets" into the works, and has publicly declared that every employe, be he Republican or Democrat, who votes for Hancock shall be summarily discharged.

The foreman of Thos. Dolan & Co.'s woolen mills promised a competent Democrat mechanic employment, and when the man presented himself he was turned off with the curt remark, "We don't want any Democrats here, and the few here we shall let slide one by one."

In numerous instances, immediately after the conversation noted had been made, a partial shutting down has been ordered, and every man discharged has been a Democrat. Republican mill-owners have furnished their employes with taxation on condition that they vote the Republican ticket, and have, on the same condition, procured naturalization papers gratis for persons not entitled to certificates of citizenship.

INDIGNANT OLD ROSY.

He Fitly Characterizes the Villainous Attempt to Steal His Laurels to Deck the Barren Brow of the Republican Candidate.

Gen. Rosecrans has sent the following telegram from San Francisco to the editor of the Cincinnati Enquirer:

> I will be obliged if you will smite the triple-headed lie appearing in the Cincinnati Commercial of the 24th of September, about Gen. Garfield writing all the orders issued at Chickamauga. None better than he knows that far the larger number were written—that all the written orders were at my dictation, of which his share was about fifty, Major Bond's fifteen or twenty, and other aides and officers ten and lesser numbers each. Among Major Bond's was the order to which official villainy first affixed the word "fatal" as a part in its framework of gigantic calumny. It ought long since to have been buried with its author.

> W. S. ROSECRANS.

No Cause for Discouragement.

Indiana is unquestionably a Democratic State, and our friends must not be discouraged by a reverse which, in the nature of things, must be temporary. At the November election we shall not have to encounter the united strength of the whole Republican party, as we have in this election. In many of the Northern States the Republicans of those States will be fully employed at home. Philadelphia will need all her roughs and her repeaters, and the campaign fund must be divided between twenty commonwealths instead of being turned merely upon one. But, more important still, we shall not have the fearful machinery of elections to contend with. There will not be imported into the State repeaters and illegal voters, and they protected by Deputy United States Marshals. We call upon our friends throughout the State to consider these plain facts, to take heart like men, and to stand to their arms. Let them move forward to the contest in November with an unabated courage, and an absolute assurance of the victory which awaits us if we do but prove true to ourselves and to our cause.—Indianapolis Sentinel.

THE effect of Ohio and Indiana in the October election upon the Democracy of the Union will certainly be as invigorating as the effect of Maine in September upon the Republicans. Four years ago the Democratic party lost Ohio and carried Indiana by only 5,000 votes, and still elected a President. The vote of Indiana is not needed to elect Hancock. The vote of Ohio was not expected in order to secure the election of Hancock. If Ohio and Indiana had voted for the Democratic ticket on Tuesday, the Presidential contest would have been ended by common consent. As they did not so vote, the November contest is still open. The Democratic managers East do not accord with the Democratic managers West. Maine and Ohio are recent illustrations. The Empire State furnishes a better illustration. New York was Democratic in 1868, when the passions of the war were hot. There is no doubt that the Democratic electoral ticket will be chosen in New York in November, and New Jersey will vote with New York. No Western vote, however given, could affect this fact about the vote of New York. The Empire State, that voted for Seymour in 1868, will vote for Hancock in 1880. New Jersey will vote with New York, and only three more electoral votes are needed to give the Presidency to the hero of Gettysburg.—Cincinnati Enquirer.

Gen. Hancock on the Tariff Question.

The following correspondence has been made public:

MORRISTOWN, N. J., Oct. 11, 1880.

MY DEAR GENERAL: My attention is called to-day to an interview, or reported interview, had with you by a person representing the Paterson Guardian, of this State. As I read the report, it seems to me you were very imperfectly understood or very indifferently reported. I came to this conclusion because of my knowledge of your views upon the tariff question. The report does you injustice. The subject is one which our manufacturing friends are very solicitous about, and very properly so. I regret that your views upon the tariff question, as I understand them to be, had not found fuller expression in your letter of acceptance. If the misrepresentations of your tariff views continue, would it not be wise and justice to take some occasion to put yourself right? Very truly yours,

To Gen. W. S. Hancock, Governor's Island.

GOVERNOR'S ISLAND, N. Y., Oct. 12.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR: I have received your favor of the 11th inst. In my letter of acceptance I expressed my full sympathy with our American industries. I thought I spoke plainly enough to satisfy our Jersey friends regarding the tariff views. I am too sound an American to advocate any departure from the general features of a policy that has been largely instrumental in building up our industries, and keeping Americans from the competition of the underpaid labor of Europe. If we intend to remain honest and pay the public debt, as good people of all parties do, and if we mean to administer the functions of the Government, then we must raise revenue in some way or other. With a reunited and harmonious country we shall certainly in time pay off the public debt, but the necessity of raising money for the administration of the Government will continue as long as human nature exists. All parties agree that the best way for us to raise revenue is largely by the tariff. So far as we are concerned, therefore, all talk about free trade is folly. But the tariff question will probably be treated with justice to all our interests and people by some such bill as Eaton's. I believe that a commission of intelligent experts, representing both the Government and American industries, will suggest tariff measures that will relieve us of any crudities and inconsistencies existing in our present laws, and confirm to us a system which will be judicious, just, harmonious, and incidentally protective as well as stable in its effects. I am, very truly yours,

W. S. HANCOCK.

The Hon. Theodore Randolph, Morristown, N.J.

Address of the Indiana Democratic Executive Committee.

To the Democratic and Independent Voters of Indiana:

The result of the election last Tuesday is a deep disappointment to us all. The extent of the success which the Republican party has achieved in this State is as much a surprise to the Republicans as it is to the Democrats, and proves that a majority of the Republican party were as ignorant of the means which their corrupt leaders were employing as we were. The temporary loss of our State is a calamity that time will enable us to retrieve, but the injury which our free institutions will sustain resulting from the frauds and corruptions practiced by the Republican leaders to secure their triumph is incalculable. The causes which enabled the Republican party to succeed are now plain. The partial success of their scheme to Africanize our State for political purposes; the corrupt use of money for the purchase of votes; the importation and use of repeaters protected by Deputy Marshals, and the aid derived by them from the use of the Federal machinery of elections, under the pretense of supervising the election of members of Congress. In the Presidential election, we will not have to encounter these forces to the same extent as in our State election. Their corruption fund will have to be divided among many States; their repeaters will be at home, and those of them who were discharged from the arrest of Deputy Marshals on straw bail will not be likely to make their appearance in our State soon again. We shall have no Federal Marshals or Federal machinery to contend against. We are thoroughly united in our counsels. Whatever our adversaries may say to the contrary is untrue. We therefore call upon you not to relax any of your efforts. Put new life and energy into your county and township organization, and take all measures in your power to bring out your full strength to the polls.

The same vote polled by us in October, if polled in November, will secure to us the State. The average majority against us at the late election will not exceed 4,000, and may fall below that figure. This majority can, and in our opinion will, be overcome in the Presidential election. A change of three votes will accomplish it. Remember, you have a leader in this contest who never sounds a retreat, and he commands an army that never surrenders.

Address of the National Democratic Committee.

To the Democratic and Conservative Voters of the Country: The election of President and Vice President is now before you. State and local dissensions are eliminated from the issues of the day. The magnitude of a victory or defeat can only be estimated by the forces and means employed in securing it. By fraud and corruption the people of the country were defeated in their purpose in 1876, and the rightfully-elected President was kept from office. With the combined capital of the Republican party, aided by repeated assessments upon an army of officeholders, with the power of the Federal Government represented by United States Marshals at the polls, with intimidation, fraud, and a resort to every corrupt appliance known to Republican methods concentrated in two States, our adversaries have succeeded in procuring the probable return of their local candidates. Can it be possible that in every State throughout this broad land the same methods can be brought to bear that were used by the Republican managers in Indiana and Ohio? Can the great States of New York, New Jersey, Connecticut, California, Colorado, Nevada and New Hampshire be bought, intimidated, and defrauded? Even without the vote of Indiana, which we believe will be redeemed in November, with New York, New Jersey and the States that are conceded to us, including Maine, the election of our candidate is assured.

The Republican party have put in nomination for President and Vice President two men who, by the admission of their own party and press, are unworthy of your confidence and your suffrages. It is impossible that fifty millions of intelligent and patriotic people will consent to place themselves upon the humiliating level thus prepared for them by the Republican managers.

Fellow-citizens, the first day's repulse at Gettysburg ended on the third, with Hancock in the front, in a glorious victory. That victory secured us our Union. The question is not now the preservation of the Union, but of constitutional government. Hancock is now, as then, in the front. The repulse is now, as then, the omen of a victory which will secure to coming generations the inestimable blessings of civil liberty.

By order of the National Democratic Committee,

WILLIAM H. BARNUM, Chairman.

Ohio Carried by Fraud.

John G. Thompson, as Chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee of Ohio, has issued the following letter to the State Democracy:

COLUMBUS, Oct. 15.

We have called a meeting of the State Committee, County Chairmen, electoral ticket, and leading Democrats to meet here to-morrow to organize for the final struggle. The fraud by which the Republican majority of last Tuesday was procured will not be repeated in November. One thousand more votes were cast in Columbus than the census shows there were male inhabitants over the age of 21, which clearly shows that Republican repeaters got in their work to a much greater extent in this city than at first supposed. An estimate from official returns received from twenty counties shows that the Democracy polled last Tuesday 30,000 more votes than at any previous election. Thousands of Democratic workingmen who were bulldozed by their Republican employers to vote the Republican ticket will vote for Hancock in November. While the Democracy of Ohio are disappointed at Tuesday's result there is an earnest determination to leave nothing undone and continue the fight for the hero of Gettysburg and victory until the polls close on the 2d prox.

Important.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

Our democratic friends throughout Indiana are urgently requested to report immediately to Hon. Joseph E. McDonald, Indianapolis, Ind., all cases of bribery, perjury and illegal voting at the late election that can be sustained by legal evidence. Vague statements are not wanted, but specific and definite charges, with the names and residence of witnesses. It does not matter if the offender has left the state, as he may be reached by requisition. And our friends will please gather and report any such violations of the law that may be discovered at the November election. If our government is to last, the time has come when these outrageous violations of law should be punished, and ample provisions are being made for the vigorous and unrelenting prosecution of all such cases. The newspapers of the state, favorable to law and order, are respectfully requested to copy this paragraph.

GARFIELD is a free-trader.

THE republicans claim that the wheat crop has become promising since Porter's election.

GARFIELD is one of the "visiting statesmen" who perpetrated the electoral fraud in 1876.

LET the honest, hard-working men of DeKalb county read James A. Garfield's letter about cheap labor.

WORKINGMEN, will you vote for a man who has placed himself on record as against your interest, and in favor of corporations?

GARFIELD wants to take the bread out of the mouths of the families of workingmen by protecting Chinese cheap labor.

"FORGERY" is the cry of sick republicans now, but they cannot get rid of that Morey letter with that kind of a stupid cry.

WORKINGMEN of DeKalb county, read Garfield's letter in this paper, concerning cheap labor, before you cast your votes next Tuesday. Whatever republicans may say to the contrary, it is the policy of their party to make the poor men poorer, and the rich men richer.

IT is expected that the Chinese will vote the republican ticket, because Garfield favored their importation to this country, but will the struggling poor men of our country vote for a man whose ever official act has been to grind them down with the iron heel of oppression?

GARFIELD opposed the bill to prevent Chinese immigration to this country, and his influence has ever been against the toiling class. His speeches and votes in congress have been in harmony with his assertion that employers should buy their labor where they could get it the cheapest.

A SPECIAL telegram of October 22, from Providence, giving an account of the legal action now being taken over the possession of Canonchet, ex-Gov. Sprague's famous residence, contains the following paragraph, which may or may not be true: "In attempting to open communication with his wife lately, in connection with her clothing, Gov. Sprague ascertained that she was not at home in Washington, but was accompanying Senator Conkling on his campaign tour through New York, traveling in his special car, and registering at the hotels where he stopped."

GARFIELD comes out and denies the authorship of the Morey letter. Garfield has a reputation for denying things. He denied under oath that he ever received any credit-mobelier stock, but the Poland committee found out from sworn testimony that he did. The Morey letter is in Mr. Garfield's own handwriting, and is in harmony with all his speeches and votes while in congress. Garfield has unmistakably put himself on record as in favor of corporations and against the working-class. It was expected that he would deny the authorship of the letter, but his denial will do no good.

LET THE SONS OF TOIL READ.

Garfield on Cheap Labor, and Especially in Favor of Chinese Cheap Labor.

He Says Corporations have the Right to Buy Labor Where They Can Get it the Cheapest.

The republican party is a party that claims a great deal. The republican party claims to have saved the Union. The republican party claims to have blessed the country with specie payment and large crops. But the most ridiculous claim that the republican party has yet set up, is that it is the friend of the laboring man, and that the compensation of the laboring man will be reduced if the republican party is not continued in power. The republican nominee, James A. Garfield, is in favor of cheap labor, and works in the interest of corporations. In proof of this, the following letter written by him, to a member of the Employers' Union, will demonstrate how little sympathy that party has had with the laboring men of the country. He is in sympathy with the principles of that party, and says that "individuals and corporations have the right to buy labor where they can get it the cheapest." The following letter which has recently been found, shows Mr. Garfield's position on the labor question—that is, to make workingmen hewers of wood and drawers of water:

[Personal and Confidential.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
WASHINGTON, D. C., January 23, 1880.

H. L. Morey, Employers' Union, Lynn, Mass.

DEAR SIR:—Yours in relation to the Chinese problem came duly to hand. I take it that the question of employes is only a question of private and corporate economy, and individuals have the right to buy labor where they can get it cheapest. We have a treaty with the Chinese government, which should be religiously kept until its provisions are abrogated by the general government, and I am not prepared to say that it should be abrogated until our great manufacturing interests are conserved in the matter of labor.

Very truly yours, J. A. GARFIELD.

The Indianapolis Sentinel in commenting upon this letter says:

It is not probable that Garfield expected to be a candidate for the presidency when he wrote this letter, but it expresses the idea of the republican party, and what his policy will be if elected—that we must have a strong government; that a few must fatten and govern upon the labor of many; that the question of the working population of the United States "is only a question of private and corporate economy, and individuals or companies have the right to buy labor where they can get it cheapest." In other words, that labor, which produces the wealth of the country, must submit to the exactions of "private and corporate economy." Have the workingmen of this country no interests or rights which wealth, whether represented by individuals or corporations, do not propose to respect?

That the republican party, or the interests which govern the republican party, is expressed by Mr. Garfield, can not be questioned when he declares to a representative of the Employers' Union that the treaty with the Chinese government, which permits the indefinite importation of cheap Chinese labor, must be religiously kept, "until our great manufacturing interests are conserved in the matter of labor." Every workingman can understand this.

Contrast this expression of the republican candidate for the presidency with that of General Hancock, who says:

"Let us encourage the harmony and generous rivalry among our own industries, which will revive our languishing merchant marine, extend our commerce with foreign nations, assist our merchants, manufacturers and producers to develop our vast natural resources and increase the prosperity and happiness of our people.

I am too sound an American to advocate any departure from the general features of a policy that has been largely instrumental in building up our industries and keeping Americans from the competition of under-paid labor."

Workingmen, can you hesitate as to a choice between Hancock and Garfield?

Garfield says that the introduction of cheap labor must not be interfered with until our great manufacturing interests are served. Hancock says the policy that has been largely instrumental in building up our industries and keeping Americans from the competition of unpaid labor must be sustained.

And what will be the result if Garfield is elected? He best expresses it when he says the treaty with the Chinese government should not be abrogated by the general government until the manufacturing interests are supplied with cheap labor. If the republicans should elect Garfield and a majority of the United States senate—and that would be the taeaty-making power—the treaty with the Chinese government would not be abrogated until, what Garfield says, "our manufacturing interests are conserved in the matter of labor;" that is, until the labor of American workingmen is brought down to the competition of under-paid labor of Europe and China.

Garfield's Chinese Letter.

[National Associate Press to the Times-Star.]

NEW YORK, Oct. 21.—The national democratic committee have examined the original of General Garfield's letter, which was published yesterday, and finding it to be genuine by comparison with other letters of Garfield, have telegraphed to various state committees, urging its circulation. Fac similes of the letter are in preparation, and will be sent throughout the country. In his address last night, Hon. Hewitt said he had examined the letter carefully, and found it to be genuine. In reference to the letter, the Truth this morning says: "The letter, after having passed through the hands of private experts before publication, was laid before the national democratic committee. There was a large attendance among them and several congressmen and senators who were familiar with Garfield's writing. After passing a critical examination it was pronounced to be genuine. Speaker Randall, who was present, said its authenticity was undoubted."

Photographed copies of the letter have been made, and so far no one who has seen it has ventured to doubt it. The letter, together with the envelope, is being stereotyped, and will be reproduced in fac simile in Friday's Truth.

Chinese Cheap Labor.

Here is an item for workingmen to consider. The Virginia (Nevada) Chronicle says:

"Messrs. N. Smart & Sons have taken a contract from Yerington, Bliss & Co. to cut and deliver in the Little Truckee, to be taken thence to lake Bigler, 40,000,000 feet of logs, the contract to be finished inside of two years, 4,000,000 feet to be delivered by May next. The contract price is $2 per thousand feet. The contractors dispatched ten men to the scene of operation yesterday morning. A few years ago there were 2,000 white men engaged in cutting timber on the mountains around Lake Bigler, and they were all making livings for their families. Now there are 3,000 Chinese cutting timber under contracts sublet to three companies by the white men who take the contracts from Yerington & Bliss, and there are very few white men at work around the lake. The Chinese cut the wood for a dollar a cord less than white men demand, and they have driven white labor almost entirely away."

"Driven white labor almost entirely away." That is just what Garfield advocates in his letter to the Employers' Union. Chinese immigration, he says, must on no account be disturbed until all employers are well supplied with this pauper Chinese labor. The situation around Lake Bigler is one which Garfield would, of course, like to see repeated all over this country. Yet, the republican organs say Garfield is such a devoted friend to the American laboring man. Bah!

What Garfield Says of the Morey Letter.

Mr. Jewell received the following letter from Gen. Garfield:

MENTOR, Oct. 23, 1880.

DEAR SIR—In my dispatches of yesterday and this evening (which are also sent to you by mail) I have denounced the Morey letter as a base forgery. Its stupid and brutal sentiments I never expressed nor entertained. The lithographed copy shows a very clumsy attempt to imitate my penmanship and signature. Any one who is familiar with my hand-writing will instantly see that the letter is spurious. Very truly, yours, J. A. GARFIELD.

Garfield denied under oath that he ever possessed any credit-mobilier stock, but all the world knows he did. Garfield prevaricated outrageously about the DeGolyer pavement job, and now he denies writing the Morey letter, but its too thin. Speaker Randall and Hon. A. S. Hewitt, who knows Garfield's writing, say he wrote the letter, and the American people prefer to believe them than to believe a perjurer.

That Republican Pole.

The republicans raised a pole here last Saturday night after dark. Whether they selected the time from habit we don't know, but certain it is that when anything crooked is on the programme, night is the time for its accomplishment. That pole is crooked, so much so that it won't stand straight. Get the butt straight and the top points over in the direction of the cemetery—where the party is going after next Tuesday. Get the top perpendicular, and the butt will afford a good sliding place for the boys in winter. One of our citizens estimated it to be "320" feet high, and says it is a monument to Credit-Mobelier Garfield. We don't think it is quite that high, and it cost a good deal less than $5,000 to put it in place. All the money contributed was absorbed in its erection, and there was no need of returning any of the swag back to the treasury. The pole is very thin, about as thin as some of the swearing in of republican votes at the late election. It only needs a rye-straw and a tooth-pick on top to give it entire symmetry to a point. It is considerably mixed in its composition—being composed of ash, of course, for the butt, tamarac in the center, a cane-pole and a fish-hook on top. The ash is symbolical of nothing, unless it be Ash Wednesday. Wednesday is the next day after Tuesday, the memorable day on which the returning-boards of the southern states, under the manipulation of such visiting statesmen as Garfield, wrongfully gave their vote to Hayes against a popular majority of over a quarter of a million. But we digress; it's the pole we want to describe. As we heretofore remarked, the pole is very crooked—a fit symbol of the party it represents. When it was lying prostrate on the ground, a friend started to walk along one side to the top end. He now swears it was so crooked that he found himself on the other side before he got half way. It is like the republican arguments on the tariff question. They start out with a high protective tariff, but when they find that the farming element are not in favor of paying 100 per cent. more for plows than they do in Canada, and 75 per cent. on all the woolen goods they wear, then the republican orators get on the other side; high protective tariff for employes in manufacturies, low protective tariff for farmers. But we are digressing. This pole is tall, thin, crooked, a fit emblem of an organization replete with official dishonesty, having for its standard-bearers a bribe-taker, and a plunderer of the New York custom-house, according to republican testimony. Again we digress. This pole is in a state of nudity, in other words, it is literally skinned, as the people have been through a long, corrupt and extravagant administration of the republican party. Millions of dollars have been swept into the pockets of ringsters and jobbers, the lobby has flourished, monopolies have fattened off the land, and the farmers have paid the bill. But to the pole. The republicans ought to be ashamed to put a pole up along side the grand old hickory, on the other side of the street. Their only ambition seems to be how far they can reach, the same intuitive, impulsive desire that was upon them when they had their hands in the public treasury. Look at the two poles. The hickory as sturdy, straight and symmetrical as the eye could wish, while the other is lean, crooked and out of proportion. Look at them as they stand, the representatives of their respective parties. No man with an appreciative eye but would in a moment select the hickory, with its rough coating, ready to resist the storm, planted firmly, squarely and straight up and down, no varying to the north or to the south, or to the east or to the west. So with the grand party it represents.

Wooden Wedding.

Mr. and Mrs. L. D. Nelson, of Jackson township, on Thursday, Oct. 21, celebrated the fifth anniversary of their marriage. There were about seventy friends and relatives present, all of whom went laden with beautiful and useful gifts for the happy couple. Rev. W. Stackhouse made an appropriate address, after which the guests partook of a bountiful supply of good things prepared by the hostress. Altogether it was an enjoyable affair, and one long to be remembered by those present.

They Don't Draw Like a Circus.

Messrs. Rose & Hartman had an appointment to plead Garfield's case at district No. 8, in Keyser township last Saturday evening. Our informant says the audience consisted of seven republicans including the speakers, and four democratic boys. The speakers concluded that their ability was not appreciated in that locality, and came home without having had the pleasure of misrepresenting and abusing democrats. They ought to feel thankful that they were saved from disgrace on that occasion at least, by not having to defend the corruption of such men as Garfield and Arthur.

The worst squirting of vulgarism and nonsense it has been our misfortune to hear during the campaign, was that of Mr. Samuel Morris, of Fort Wayne, last Saturday evening, at this place. His paroxysm of screeching was pitiable to witness, and his irregular, disconnected harangue disgusted even the republicans. There is little sympathy in the people of this county for blatherskites. We regret to say this on account of the great esteem in which his father, Judge Morris, is held by the citizens here of all parties. Under all circumstances Judge Morris is a fair, candid, honorable gentleman. His son has introduced himself here in an entirely opposite character.

The Standard Dramatic Company.

This little company—six in number—made their appearance in Auburn and began a week's engagement at Ensley's hall Monday evening. The weather for the past three evenings has been unfavorable for theater-going, and the attendance though fair, and composed of many of the best people of Auburn, has not been as large as the company merits. Their entertainment each evening has been chaste and creditable, and the repeated and enthusiastic applauses that have greeted the players testified the high appreciation of the audiences. The play Tuesday evening entitled "Parted, or united at last," was creditably rendered, all the characters being well impersonated. Mr. Wm. N. Compston, the manager, in the character of an old man is specially good, there being at times much of the emotional in his acting. To-night they will present the beautiful play entitled "Milky White." The company will continue to play here the remainder of the week, and will go from here to Garrett.

—Sammy Morris, of Ft. Wayne, was brought up here to make a speech last Saturday, on the occasion of the raising of a Garfield pole at this place. He made the speech, and in one respect it was the most remarkable one we have heard during the campaign. The speaker talked long and loud on state rights and the tariff, concerning both of which he revealed a large fund of ignorance. But the feature which made this speech remarkable, was the low, dirty vulgarity and profanity which were interspersed throughout it. Any one, be he democrat or republican, who will outrage decency in this style, especially in the presence of ladies, is lacking in that kind of training that distinguishes the gentleman from the rough, and deserves the severest condemnation of a people. The ladies present were shocked, and one lady especially, who is a republican, was thoroughly disgusted, and condemned the insult in very forcible terms. The people of Auburn are not a class of rough cattle to be blackguarded in this style.

—The Garfield club will go to Auburn Friday evening next and participate in a grand rally there.—[Fort Wayne Sentinel.

—Now is the winter of our discontent made dark, dreary and damnable by the foul weather and still fouler election.

—Prof. Myers says that the institute held at Butler was an interesting affair, and one highly creditable to our county superintendent.

—Rev. H. Johnson was in attendance at the meeting of the Presbyterian synod in Fort Wayne, which closed Monday.

—Our old friend, Elias I. Born, of Colen, Mich., is spending a few days with friends in this city previous to a trip to the far west.

—Mr. Slaybaugh, of Butler, has taken charge of the grocery-store he recently purchased from Mr. Porter, and has moved his family here.

—Buy your clothing and overcoats of Schaab, Beugnot & Co., as they can and will sell you goods cheaper than any other store in northern Indiana.

—New styles cloakings and cloaks, new repellants and ladies' cloth, new all-wool dress plaids, at McQuiston & Ralston's. 43-3w.

—The republicans will have a grand rally in Auburn next Saturday. Prof. Burgess and other prominent radicals will lie about the democrats on this occasion.

—The alarm of fire was sounded last Saturday evening, but nothing more serious than the burning out of a chimney in the Swineford house occurred.

—Charley Emanuel says that Garfield never wrote the letter about Chinese cheap labor. Charley, you know, is a republican, which accounts for his incredulity.

—Mr. Hardesty, the young attorney who recently located here, has this week been to see his better half, at his old home in Fort Clinton, Ohio. She will shortly join him here.

—John Korth is with G. H. Yeabera no more. He took leave for Kendallville this morning, where he will remain for a few days and then, he says, "I goes to Kal-am-ma-zoo, Mich."

—While shoeing a "hore" Monday afternoon, Chris. Manning was severely bruised.—Hicksville News.

—After next Tuesday the political strife will end, and the fate of this Union will be sealed for weal or woe for the next four years. If Garfield is elected, we will have Grant and the empire in 1884.

—At Miss Alice McKay's neat little establishment over Miss Jones' store can be found a fine line of millinery goods, such as hats, in felt and straw, trimmings, ribbons, feathers, flowers, rouchings, etc.

—The Corunna band has recently disposed of their old instruments, and purchased new ones, which are very fine. The new instruments cost nine hundred dollars. This is one of the finest bands in northern Indiana, its members are jolly good fellows, and we are glad to hear of their prosperity.

—Miss Alice McKay has three large and beautiful chromo pictures which will be given away to her customers. Persons buying goods to the amount $1.00 will receive a ticket entitling them to a chance for one of the pictures; a purchase of two dollars worth of goods entitles one to two tickets, or an opportunity for two pictures, and a purchase to the amount of three dollars will afford an opportunity of procuring all three of the chromos.

—Messrs. Nick. Ensley and Louis Johnson have entered into a contract to the effect that if Hancock is elected the former shall cary a torch in a democratic procession, and if Garfield is elected the latter shall carry a torch in a republican procession. They are both honorable gentlemen, and the losing one will stick to the contract. Mr. Ensley can get a lamp by calling at the democratic headquarters, which he had better keep "trimmed and burning" for the occasion, for he is stuck.

—In a recent speech at Ensley's hall, Mr. Penfield remarked that there were 100,000 good, fat offices in the United States, and no democrat need apply. It is very evident that the republicans like these "fat" offices, and it is also very evident that they are making use of them, too, by spending the people's money in the present campaign. But, Mr. Penfield, don't worry yourself so much about us democrats. We will retain about "329" republican office-holders, after the fourth of March next —in the penitentiary.

—The COURIER will not occupy the elegant new rooms in the Kiblinger building.—[Republican.

The h—ll you say. Who was telling you? How did you make such a discovery, any way? This statement is about as near the truth as the Republican ever approaches. The election of a republican sheriff does not effect the COURIER's prosperity or plans, and it will continue in the future, as in the past, to be the largest-circulated paper in DeKalb county, while the Republican will continue in the future, as in the past, to find a market only on the strength of its admirable adaptation for bustle-material.

—An exchange offers this sensible advice: "Every man should mind his own business, and only that. It is hard to tell him so in plain words, yet it is one of the simplest rules of conduct, and the most useful that mankind can adopt in their intercourse with each other. There is a great deal of Paul Pry in the human heart, or wonderful inquisitiveness in regard to the personal or private affairs of friends and neighbors. Their spirit makes more mischief in the community than almost any other cause, and creates more malice, envy and jealousy than can be overcome in a century. Let every man mind his own business and there will not be half the trouble in the world that there is at present."

LaPorte Argus: "The capacity shown by the republican press for thick and thin lying in this campaign has been kaleidoscopic in its variableness, and each succeeding lie has rivalled all others in gauzy brilliancy.

Hicksville News: "During this season the firm of Ainsworth, Boon & Bevington have bought 25,260 pounds of wool, at prices raging from 35 cents to 40 cents per pound. They have shipped 15,260 pounds. This is a good showing."

Kendallville News: "An error was made in the footing of C. V. Inks, S. S. Shutt and P. P. Miner's vote in this place on the tally-sheet, which, when corrected, will give them fifty more votes, and making the majority against them in this township fifty less. We are really glad these errors were discovered, as we were at a loss to account why Messrs. Inks and Shutt should run behind their party ticket. This correction puts them ahead of the state ticket, and places their friends right here. Mr. Inks is now only defeated by 37 votes."

AN ODE TO AN OLD STOVEPIPE.

Infernal stuff, your [illegible] well I know,
So when I took you down six months ago
Each piece I numbered so that I might know
Exactly how you'd go together well.
And now the time for chilly days draws nigh
To put you up again I fairly try.
But all in vain. The joints that then did fit
Now do not come within an inch of it.
I get you two-thirds put in place and then
Crash you go tumbling to the floor again.
Once more I try. You're nearly full of soot,
And I am getting [illegible] from head to foot.
I jam my thumb, [illegible]
One piece goes down again and rakes my ear.
I grab to catch the piece, another goes,
And falling scrapes the skin all off my nose.
And then another piece falls with a slam,
And then the rest goes down and I say "Dam!"
And then my blood gets boiling and I say,
"By all that's blue, I'll [illegible] anyway!"
Once more I go to work [illegible]
I get all but a single section straight,
And that I am about to place, when oh!
The chair I stand on tips. Down flat I go;
While on and around me, with a horrid crash,
The whole comes down again in one grand smash.
And then my wife [illegible] "I never saw
A man so clumsy! [illegible] Hold your jaw!"
And for a human [illegible] I retire
To wash myself and [illegible] to vent my ire.

PEN BRADSHAWE.

"Yes, sir—yes, Mr. Clive Soulard, I've made up my mind. If you are bent on marrying a woman who doesn't care one fig for you, you are at liberty to do so."

"Very well, Pen."

Mr. Clive Soulard spoke very quietly, and bent his handsome eyes on the girl with an expression of mingled nonchalance and amusement.

"I don't consider it very well, Mr. Soulard," she went on, nettled by his quietude. "It may be very well for you, who marry me for my money, and so get all you want. It's bad, and wicked, and cruel, and you know it."

"Ah! Indeed, Pen, I was not aware that the advantages of this arrangement were not mutual. I am sure I supposed it a purely business matter on both sides."

"To be sure, but you have everything else to gain, and I everything to lose."

The shadow of a flush arose in Clive Soulard's cheek, but it was gone before Penelope Bradshawe saw it, and he answered, in the light, careless tone he had used all along:

"If you mean to gain that I give up poverty for wealth, the miseries of bachelorhood for married blessedness, I don't know but what you're right as to that; but even then what do I gain that you don't? You can have the money without me more than I can have the money without you, and really, Pen, if you are as lovely as a Peri, I think I may lay claim to the good looks of Antinous—eh, Pen?" running his slender white fingers through the halo of bronze brown curls that covered his handsome head, and sending a laughing glance into the mirror opposite that reflected a face beautiful almost as a woman's.

"Tush," said Pen, coloring with impatience, "I don't think that this is any time to talk nonsense and make fun."

"Perhaps not," he replied, with a hopelessly comical sigh; "but I can't help being jolly, dear. It isn't every day one gets a fortune and a wife in a breath, and without the trouble of asking for her either."

"You haven't got the wife yet, Clive Soulard; and if you were a man you wouldn't take her on such conditions."

"Conditions? I didn't know there were any. It's the money that is conditional, not the wife."

Poor Pen was ready to cry with vexation. The handsome, provoking fellow only laughed at her whatever she said.

She might protest as much as she liked against the match which her uncle had planned so arbitrarily, making the inheritance of his money conditional on these two marrying. Clive Soulard only laughed at her, and made jesting responses to all her appeals.

Penelope Bradshawe had been brought up as the adopted child and heiress of her uncle, Reese Bradshawe. A year before, this uncle had died, leaving a will, which was not to be opened till he had been dead twelve months.

That will, being read at the appointed time, proved to contain the somewhat arbitrary dictum that his beloved niece should not have his money without she married his beloved cousin, Clive Soulard, the said Clive being still single at the opening of the will.

Pen Bradshawe was an exceedingly pretty girl, but contrary, captious and self-willed, as pretty girls are apt to be, and she frowned in the most decided manner upon the unexpected tenor of her uncle's will. If he had given Clive half the property she wouldn't have minded, but to force her to make her choice between poverty and Clive—to oblige a saucy little flirt like her to marry anybody—was abominable.

She forgot, even in her own mind, to add to the sum of her grievances on the subject the fact that the provoking will cut short the most delightful little flirtation Miss Pen had ever indulged in.

She had known Clive all her life; indeed, they were distant cousins, and Clive had spent a good share of his boyhood, and most of his vacations, during school and college days, at Uncle Bradshawe's house, where pretty Pen alternately petted and plagued the life out of him.

It was bad enough to be snubbed and coaxed by so pretty a girl as Pen while he was in jackets and she in pinafores, but to have such a state of affairs continue—well, it was so highly unpleasant to Mr. Clive Soulard that he could not conceal his exultation at the turn which was necessarily given to affairs by the terms of Uncle Reese's will.

He at once stopped the suppliant air, and became nonchalant, careless, and at his ease—provokingly so one must allow, under the circumstances. Pen Bradshawe could hardly be blamed for not liking the tables turned upon her in this summary manner.

She persisted that she did not like Clive one bit, not in that way, but she could not give up her heirship and be a poor sewing-girl like Kitty Bryce, or a music-teacher like Ellen Steele, or in short, be poor at all, and so she told Clive that she would marry him for that reason and no other, if he had a mind to take her, knowing that she did not love him, and never expected to, and that she thought it a shameful piece of business altogether—a cruel conspiracy against a poor girl who couldn't help herself—while he could.

For her part, she should be afraid to marry anybody that felt toward her as she did toward Clive Soulard, etc., studying to say whatever she judged was best calculated to provoke her prospective spouse out of that [illegible] nonchalance he had only so lately assumed.

But Clive was not to be provoked. He assured Pen that it made no sort of difference her not loving him—the money was the main object—which assurance, strangely enough, did not comfort Pen a particle, or make her one whit more resigned to her fate. He utterly declined withdrawing his claim either to the money or Pen.

The possession of the former being conditional upon taking the latter how could he be gravely questioned. Pen thought if he were not utterly selfish, instead of forcing her into marrying a man she didn't like, he would refuse to fulfill the condition of the will himself, and so generously bestow upon her the property and freedom at the same time.

But Clive disclaimed all pretensions to unselfishness, and candidly told her if she had such an invincible repugnance to him she had better give up the property and secure her freedom at the same time.

He thought it would be a pity to marry a man she disliked so much as she seemed to do. Now, with him it was different. He didn't dislike Pen, by any means; he was rather thankful, on the whole, that dear old Uncle Reese hadn't thrown Ann Thompson in his way instead of Pen Bradshawe; he could think of plenty of worse incumbrances to a fine property like that than Pen.

Vastly consoling this style of talk, was it not? Was he laughing at her, or was he in earnest? Had he only been playing with her all that past time, when he seemed to live on her smiles—when a frown, or a petulant word, would make him apparently the most wretched of men? Or, had he (oh, most heart-rending supposition!) the money in view all the time, and only sought her to secure that?

It looked like it, certainly—this sudden assumption of indifference to her pleasure, this open exultation in the terms of her uncle's will. Pen, the beautiful, the bewitching, the tantalizing was quite nonplussed. If she really thought, if she were postively certain, that he wasn't doing this to plague her, that he didn't care for anything but the money, she wouldn't have him to save his life; she'd go off and be a governess, or take in sewing for a living before she would marry him.

No, she wouldn't either; in this case she'll have him out of spite. In short, besides having a natural shrinking from sewing for a living, Pen consciously or otherwise, did not dislike her future spouse quite to the extent she pretended.

Somewhere in her capricious heart there was a soft place for Clive Soulard all the time.

He was so handsome, so graceful, all the other girls were in love with him if she was not.

And so the weeks wore away until the wedding day; Clive, light-hearted, careless, laughing, banteringly sympathetic, ten times as handsome and agreeable as he had ever been, but not in the least lover-like—anything but that; Pen, sulky and saucy by turns, but really miserable, and secretly, for a reason she could not confess to herself, but much less so to Mr. Clive Soulard.

Pen, the invincible, was in love at last, and, of all men, with Clive Soulard. If Clive suspected it he kept his suspicions to himself, and never, by any chance, dropped word or look that could be construed as symptomatic of the tender passion.

The change in Pen Bradshawe since the reading of her uncle's will was too marked not to be apparent. People commented variously upon it. Some pitied her for being compelled to a marriage so distasteful; others thought, with Clive Soulard, that if it was distasteful she alone was to blame if she did not choose the utterest poverty in preference to it.

Pen, meanwhile, meditating and speculating constantly on Clive's changed demeanor, concluded at last that he was as indifferent to her as he pretended to be; and she resolved, if nothing occurred before the wedding-day, to refuse then to marry him, whether or no.

She had made all the usual preparations. Her dressing-room was strewn with snowy lace, silk and muslins; the bridesmaids for the occasion were being drilled and otherwise got ready for their part in the approaching ceremony.

The wedding morning came.

Forth from her chamber floated the bride, clad in flowing snow, and surrounded by her bridesmaids, like the Queen rose in a garden of blossoms; forth stepped the bridegroom, handsome, graceful, light of heart, and exultant. Penelope let him take her hand, and lead her forward, without lifting her eyes till they stood at the very altar steps. Then, suddenly, she looked up, first at him, then at the assembled guests, and, drawing her hand from him, she said, with slow, deliberate enunciation:

"I cannot do it. Better poverty, better wretchedness, better anything, than such a marriage as this. I have changed my mind. Good friends, it is a pity to disappoint you, but there will be no wedding to-day."

So saying, she glided through the astonished groups and left them staring breathlessly after her.

The luckless bridegroom knew not what to say, or to do, or where to look. He was taken at a disadvantage; wounded full sore at a point where, being tender but unsuspicious, he had not sufficiently guarded himself.

Was it the mortification, the slight, the being so publicly rejected by so lovely a girl as Pen Bradshawe?

Or did his very inmost heart quail with fear at the thought of losing, after all, a woman who, with all her coquettish frivolousness, was worth more to him than all the other women put together—than twenty fortunes like the one she forfeited to him by refusing to become his wife?

Certainly Clive Soulard's handsome face had suddenly taken the hue of death, and his voice was unsteady as he tried to murmur something that sounded like a confused apology or explanation of this strange contretemps.

The guests fell into little whispering knots, the clergyman who was to have officiated looked confounded, and the bridal attendants stole half-frightened, curious glances at Clive Soulard, who, with his eyes downcast, his whole appearance expressive of the agitated conflict going on within him, stood struggling vainly to recall his self-possession.

Presently he drew nearer the clergyman, said something inaudible to others, and with a half-deprecatory glance left the room.

In a stupefaction scarcely less than his, Penelope had managed somehow to reach her own chamber again, and was sitting amid the chaotic array of bridal gear that strewed the room, when a timid knock sounded at the door.

All her energies rallied at the sound. Pausing deliberately to rouge her white cheeks, she waited for a second knock, and opened the door.

It was Soulard himself who stood there, palid, yet resolute—agitated, but determined.

Fire seemed to flash from his handsome eyes as they met hers; his nostrils quivered and dilated.

He looked his true self—manly—not easily baffled this time.

It was on Pen's lips to say, in the assurance of the triumph she felt to be hers, "Oh, it is you, is it?" But, instead, she caught at the door unsteadily, and said:

"Oh, Clive—Clive!"

"Do you love me, Pen? That is what I came for—what I will know."

"You haven't any right to ask me, Clive, after—after all you've said and done to make me think you didn't care a straw for me, or anything but the money," said Pen, falteringly.

"I was foolish, trying to pay off old scores, that's all. I love you better than my life, Pen. If you are not going to share it with me, I'll make a bonfire of Uncle Reese's fortune and shoot myself afterward. Will you come now?"

Perhaps that particular bevy of wedding guests waiting below never experienced a profounder sensation than when the drawing-room door opened again and Mr. Clive Soulard marched in with the look of a conquering hero, conducting Pen Bradshawe, blushing, smiling and tearful, but evidently glad and willing.

They walked straight to the old place, the minister managed to keep his senses under the most trying circumstances, the words were said—the twain made one; and if one might judge from the expression of the eye and countenance, two happier people than these never wore matrimonial chains.

A Good Old Man.

"You see, my children," he said, as a little group huddled around him, "there is no habit that you can not rid yourself of if you are resolved. Now, in my early youth I was a sailor, and contracted the popular habit of swearing at everything and nothing. Without provocation I would rattle off a string of oaths and violate the commandment a hundred times a day. When I left the sea my mother's early teaching returned to me, and I mentally resolved that I would never swear again. That was forty years ago, and I have never violated the promise I made myself. Some of you have little habits which you can easily rid yourself of; promise me now, my dearies, that you will call up your worst habit and drop it to-night."

The promises were readily given, and then came calls for a story. It was his habit to supplement his little lecture by stories.

"Well, little beauty, I will let the shell tell it."

He placed it to his ear, closed his eyes, and said:

"Hark! I hear the sea. It is the Mediterranean, and before me is a ship plunging upon the stormy waves. The crew are huddled about in terror, and the vessel plunges along in the lightning-rent, with no hand at the helm. But there is one form that trembles not. It stands at the bow with upturned face, gazing into the heavens."

"Right again, my child. Inspired by a divine faith, he stands unmoved in the night; neither fear nor pain can move him. He is a true man, and—"

The old man paused; the shell dropped from his hand, and a look of startled inquiry came over his face. He sprang to his feet and danced a cancan in the room; he called on his patron saint and swore a string of oaths thirteen feet long as he rent the air with discordant shrieks; the women screamed; the children cried; the police came, and four neighbors at last bore him to the floor and sat upon him, while another removed with a pair compasses a bug from his ear.

One little cockroach, hid in a shell, had upset the resolutions of forty years' standing.

Statistics of the Production of Beer.

Some official tables connected with the production of beer in all the European countries and the United States have been lately issued under authority of the Austrian Government. The following is a summary of the production during 1879: The whole German Empire produced 18,946,510 hectolitres, or 23,811,117 British barrels; Great Britain, 36,597,550 hectolitres, or 22,375,019 barrels; the United States of North America, 15,400,000 hectolitres, or 9,425,252 barrels; Austria-Hungary, 11,184,681 hectolitres, or 6,838,090 barrels; France, 8,721,000 hectolitres, or 5,331,845 barrels; Belgium, 7,854,000 hectolitres, or 4,801,778 barrels; Russia, 2,300,000 hectolitres, or 1,406,174 barrels; the Netherlands, 1,600,000 hectolitres, or 978,208 barrels; Denmark, 1,100,000 hectolitres, or 672,518 barrels; Sweden, 930,000 hectolitres, or 568,583 barrels; Italy, 870,000 hectolitres or 531,900 barrels; Switzerland, 724,000 hectolitres, or 448,753 barrels; Norway, 615,000 hectolitres, or 376,000 barrels. The greatest production in proportion to the population is in Belgium, where 167 litres, or a little over 34½ gallons per head, were manufactured; and the smallest production was in Russia, where the ratio was only three litres, or a little more than 5¼ pints for every inhabitant.

Who Needed It Most.

One night a Judge, a military officer, and a minister, all applied for lodging at an inn where there was but one spare bed, and the landlord was called upon to decide which had the best claim of the three. "I have lain fifteen years in the garrison at B.," said the officer. "I have sat as Judge twenty years in R.," said the Judge. "With your leave, gentlemen, I have stood in the ministry twenty-five years at N.," said the minister. "That settles the dispute," said the landlord. "You, Mr. Captain, have lain fifteen years—you, Mr. Judge, have sat twenty years—but the aged pastor has stood five-and-twenty years, so he certainly has the best right to the bed."

Boy Inventors.

Some of the most important inventions have been the work of mere boys. The invention of the valve motion to the steam engine was made by a mere boy. Watts left the engine in a very incomplete condition, from the fact that he had no way to open or close the valves, except by means of leavers operated by the hand. He set up a large engine at one of the mines, and a boy was hired to work these valve levers; although this was not hard work, yet it required his constant attention. As he was working these levers, he saw that parts of the engine moved in the right direction, and at the exact time that he had to open or close the valves. He procured a strong cord and made one end fast to the proper part of the engine, and the other end to the valve lever; the boy had the satisfaction of seeing the engine move off with perfect regularity of motion. A short time after the foreman came around and saw the boy playing marbles at the door. Looking at the engine he soon saw the ingenuity of the boy, and also the advantages of so great an invention. Mr. Watts then carried out the boy's inventive genius in a practical form, and made the steam engine a perfect automatic working machine.

The power-loom is the invention of a farmer boy who had never seen or heard of such a thing. He whittled one out with his jack-knife, and after he had got it all done, he, with great enthusiasm, showed it to his father, who at once kicked it pieces, saying he would have no boy about him that would spend his time on such foolish things. The boy was delighted at the idea of learning a trade, and he soon found that his new master was kind and took a lively interest in him. He had made a loom of what was left of one his father had broken up, which he showed to his master. The blacksmith saw he had no common boy as an apprentice, and that the invention was a very valuable one. He immediately had a loom constructed under the supervision of the boy; it worked to their perfect satisfaction, and the blacksmith furnished the means to manufacture the looms, the boy to receive one-half the profits. In about a year the blacksmith wrote to the boy's father that he should bring with him a wealthy gentleman who was the inventor of the celebrated power loom. You may be able to judge of the astonishment at the old home when his son was presented to him as the inventor, who told him that his loom was the same as the model that he had kicked to pieces but a year before.—Western Trade.

Meant Him.

When a railroad passenger hears the whistle sounding an alarm, it is his first impulse to look out of the window, but this impulse is often restrained by second thought, except in the case of green travelers. A few days ago an old man and his wife were passengers on a Lake Shore train, and as the section men were making repairs on the line in various places, the whistle was sounded pretty often. The old couple were fully alive to every "toot," and each time the old man would stick his head out of the window.

"Does it mean any thing, Samuel?" asked the wife every time his head came back, but he could give her no satisfactory explanations. A traveler behind them finally warned the old man that he ran a risk by sticking his head out, but at the very next toot he was at it again. He wore a plug hat which looked fully twenty years old, and its loss would be nothing great. Preparations were quietly made behind him, and every thing was all ready when next the whistle sounded.

"I wonder what's on the track now?" queried the wife, as she moved around uneasily.

"I dunno," he replied; "I believe we've run over as many as a dozen men since we left Toledo."

Out went his head, his face toward the engine, and a smart rap with a cane from the next window knocked his hat off, and sent it flying into a swamp. He pulled back with such a rush that he almost went over his wife into the aisle.

"Land a stars! but did it mean any thing?" she cried, as she grasped him.

"I should think it did!" he yelled, "It meant that I was a durned old fool, and had got to go bareheaded all the rest of this summer!"

The hard-hearted conductor refused to stop the train and recover the hat, and at the end of a hot discussion the bare-headed victim brought his fist down with shivering force, and exclaimed:

"Waal, now, I want you to understand that if there is any law in this land, this 'ere railroad has got to move its fence-corners back. 'Sposen' them rails had given me a wipe on the jaw?"

American Glass Making.

The first glass factory in America was erected in 1609 near Jamestown, Va., and the second followed in the same colony twelve years later. In 1639 some acres of ground were granted to glassmen in Salem, Mass., probably the first year of the industry which was prosecuted there for many years. The first glass factory in Pennsylvania was built near Philadelphia in 1683, under the direction of Wm. Penn, but did not prove successful. The first glass factory west of the Alleghenies was set up by Albert Gallatin and his associates in 1785, at New Geneva, on the Monongahela River. A small factory was established on the Ohio River, near Pittsburg, in 1790, and another in 1795. The earlier attempt failed, the later was quite successful. In 1810 there were twenty-two glass factories in the country, with an annual product valued at $1,047,000. There are now about five times as many factories, producing eight times as much glass. According to the returns received under the recent census, our flint glass factories turn out 210,554 tons of table and other glass-ware; and the window-glass works produce 2,644,440 boxes. The total value of the product is nearly $45,750,000.—Scientific American.

THE Washington paper says that Justice Harlan, of the United States Supreme Court, is passionately fond of foot-ball. This fact should prove a valuable pointer for young men who intend calling on his daughters.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

AN exchange says: "In mild cases of dyspepsia take one teaspoonful of sweet oil, after eating, three times a day. In severe forms take a dessert-spoonful. This followed up has cured cases where doctors have given them up. Ye who suffer from this dread disease, don't fail to try it."

CHILBLAINS usually indicate a low state of the system and need of hearty food and tonics, such as iron or quinine. A local application of a thick paste composed of slack lime, moistened with a very little water and common oil, is recommended as a good remedy. For chapped hands, another of the unpleasant accompaniments of cold weather, and, with some people, apt to be not only disagreeable, but positively painful, the best remedy is glycerine, to be put on at night on retiring, and over that a pair of old gloves, to be kept on all night.

IT is worth while for common people to know that 50,000 typhus germs will thrive in the circumference of a pin-head or a visible globule. It is worth while for them to note that these germs may be desiccated and be borne, like thistle seeds, everywhere, and, like demoniacal possessions, may jump noiselessly down any throat. But there are certain things spores cannot stand, according to the latest ascertained results of science. Soap chemically poisons them. For redemption fly to hot water and soap, ye who live in danger of malarial poisoning. Hot water is sanitary. Soap is more sanitary. Fight typhus, small-pox, yellow fever, and ague with soap. Soap is a board of health.

CURING SICK HEADACHE.—A Vermont correspondent writes that, after suffering from sick headache for twenty years, with frequent attacks of diphtheria, quinsy and erysipelas, she has discovered the cause of all her troubles. Eight months' abstinence from meat has cured her of dyspepsia and all the ailments she has suffered from, and her health is better than it has been for many years. On a diet of vegetables and cereals, with fish and eggs occasionally, she is well and strong. Happy are they who find out their limitations, physical, intellectual and spiritual, and do not ruin health and happiness in a vain endeavor to digest something beyond their powers.

A NEW WAY TO TREAT DIPHTHERIA.—Quite a discovery in the treatment of diphtheria has been made recently. A young man whose arm had been amputated was attacked by diphtheria before healing took place; and, instead of the matter incident to that disease being deposited in the throat, the greater portion appeared in the wounded arm, and the diphtheria was very light and easily managed. Dr. Davis profited by this, and in his next case of diphtheria blistered his patient's breast, and on this blistered part the chief deposits appeared. This was also an easy case of the disease. The theory is that diphtheria usually appears in the throat because of the thinness of the lining of the throat. Hence, when the blister breaks the skin upon the other part of the body the disease appears there.

A CAREFUL DIET.—The health depends largely upon the diet. Good food is in many instances better than medicine. How many dishes in common use ought to be discarded from our tables, if we would not become acquainted with that unwelcome visitor, dyspepsia. I am convinced by observation that many more might be restored to health if nourishing food suitable to their condition, and needful rest from work or care were given them, instead of stimulating the system by exciting drinks and powerful drugs. Give nature a chance and she will do much toward repairing the wasted energies, if the kind of food is given that the case demands. There is much choice in the kinds of meat and the manner of preparing them, which we should always observe when cooking for an invalid guest, or member of the family. The fruits and vegetables should also be selected with great care, and often it is necessary that some special dish should be prepared for them, as they are necessarily deprived of so much that others indulge in. We feel more than repaid for extra work when we have succeeded in getting something to tempt the appetite of the sick, with no bad results to follow.

Anywhere to Get Away.

Mr. Greeley had been invited to deliver a lecture at a village a few miles from Chicago. He appointed the time for Saturday evening, but was dismayed at finding when there that there was no train to take him back to Chicago before Monday. His first question of the gentleman who was awaiting him was if there was no way in which he could get out of town the next day.

"Not by a public conveyance," he was told.

"No boats?"

"Not at this season of the year." (December.)

A sharp cross-questioning elicited the information that an occasional propeller stopped at one of the piers during the winter months, but there was no certainty of such an event occurring. Sunday morning Mr. Greeley was down at the shore, looking as longingly as a ship-wrecked sailor for a sail. No boat appearing his host prevailed upon him to go to church with him. "We had it in our little church," says the writer, "that day a clergyman to whom even Mr. Greeley might have listened with profit if not with pleasure. Listening, however, was not Mr. Greeley's intention. Settling himself in a corner of the pew he went to sleep, and slept on until near the close of the sermon. Suddenly the whistle of a propeller sounded through the air. The great editor started, pricked up his ears, then jumped up without a glance even at his host, walked down the aisle and out of the church, and was seen no more by the inhabitants. Afterward it was learned that the propeller was on its way to Milwaukee, not Chicago. 'But anywhere to get away,' said Mr. Greeley."

USEFUL HINTS.

GOOD COFFEE.—Good coffee can be made in a common coffee-pot by observing the following rules: Use the best Old Java, and allow one tablespoonful for each person that is to drink, then pour on boiling water in the proportion of a pint to each table-spoonful, and break an egg into the pot, throwing in the shell also. If you think it extravagant to use an egg for this purpose, a fishskin as large as an old-fashioned cent will settle it well. Boil about half an hour, and just before serving pour out a little of the coffee and return it to the pot, and set it in some place where it will stand even, but not on the stove.

A TIDY ROOM.—Do you ever observe that a tidy room is invariably a cheerful one? It is cheering to come into one's breakfast-room and find it spotlessly tidy; but still more certainly will cheerfulness come if tidiness is the result of our own exertion; and so we counsel our friends, if you are ever disheartened, vexed or worried about something that has gone wrong with you in the world, to have resort to the great refuge of tidiness. Don't sit brooding and wondering. Go to work and make everything tidy about you and you cannot fail to recover your cheerfulness.

HOW TO WASH THE FACE.—Many people object to the use of soap for the face, disliking the shiny, polished appearance it gives, but any who will use Dr. Wilson's directions will find that objection removed. They are as follows: "Fill your basin about two-thirds full with fresh water; dip your face in the water and then your hands. Soap the hands well and pass the soaped hands with gentle friction over the whole face. Having performed this part of the operation thoroughly, dip the face in the water a second time and rinse it completely. You may add very much to the luxury of the latter part of the operation by having a second basin ready with fresh water to perform a final rinse."

TO PRESERVE HARNESS.—There is nothing looks nicer in its way than a clean, bright-looking set of harness, nor is there anything more quickly damaged by neglect. Harness should be washed and oiled frequently. To do this effectually the straps should be unbuckled and detached, and then washed with soft water and crown soap, and hung by a slow fire or in the sun until nearly dry, then coated with a mixture of neatsfoot oil and tallow and allowed to remain in a warm room for several hours, and when perfectly dry rub thoroughly with a woolen rag. The rubbing is important, as it, in addition to removing the surplus oil and grease, tends to close the pores and give a finish to the leather. In hanging harness care should be taken to allow all the straps to hang their full length. All closets should be well ventilated, and when possible be well lighted. To clean plated mountings, use a chamois with a little tripoli or rotten stone, but they should be scoured as little as possible.

KEEPING WINTER APPLES.—No matter how much care one may exercise in packing and storing, it will not be sufficient to keep unripe, bruised or badly handled apples or other fruit. The great desideratum in keeping all kinds of fruit is in keeping it free from dampness. The plan adopted by some experienced fruit-growers is to have a regular fruit-room, built to exclude light and to maintain an even temperature. Where large crops are to be stored, it pays to build such a room or house for the purpose, but for a few barrels, almost any room on the cool side of the house will answer, but a dry, cool cellar is preferable, as there is less danger from freezing, and it is easier to preserve an even temperature. In storing the apples, if they have been properly picked at the proper time, properly handled, and packed in barrels on the most improved plan, the barrels are piled in regular tiers, the lower tier resting on "skids," or pieces of timber to keep from the ground and dampness. We have seen fine apples in March and April, which have been kept on board hanging-shelves in the cellar, the fruit having lain close as possible together without touching on a bed of dry straw. They were looked over occasionally, and when any showed signs of rotting they were at once removed.

Bit of Colorado Romance.

One of the richest lions of this city at the present date looks as if, were he in Paris at the proper moment, he would wear a bonnet rouge and carry a mitrailleuse. Farther up in the mountains the air of this lion would set the fashions not only of a camp but many of its visitors also. The brigand style is exceedingly fascinating to the eyes of romantic, impracticable young woman, and also to lads with half-grown mustaches. I saw a young lady at Georgetown whose eyes and heart had become entangled with the man who was too familiar with sharp knives, and I do not refer to the town butcher. This lassie secured a fine broncho with a scarlet saddle-cloth, and over her handsome dark-green, gold-buttoned habit she wore a gold-mounted leather belt, to which was attached a sheathed knife with a guarded hilt. In the band of her Derby cap she wore a lighter knife that glistened, both of which might be useful in her hands if she were attacked by a Colorado grasshopper. In city terms she openly expressed her admiration for the town desperado. "He could and would protect a woman's honor with his very life," she lisped to the stanch fellow who corralled her tired broncho. "Yes, and kill her, too, when she was in his way or vexed him, and that is what he has done more than once, as we all know, but we cannot prove it. He'll be lucky if he don't find himself made into a tassle by Mr. Lynch some bright midnight." The poor girl cried a little, then laid off her belt and knives and with a deep sigh awoke from her bright dream.—Denver Letter to Chicago Times.

How Gen. Torbert Died.

A letter to the New York Herald from Titusville, Fla., says: "I send you the facts in regard to the death of Gen. Torbert. He came on shore bound and lashed to a piece of the wreck, and was still alive when he reached the beach; the bank being very abrupt and high and a sea running mountain high, he could not free himself. He was dashed in and out by the action of the sea along the beach for two and a half miles. When rescued life was found to have become extinct. He fought the surging billows manfully, but to no avail. It was a sight not easily described, to see a brave man lashed to a piece of timber, in the jaws of death, on a mad and furious ocean, now on a huge wave running toward the sand hills, and in another moment carried out as far as the eye could see, dashed to and fro, while four strong and powerful men were looking on, and were unable to raise a hand to save this brave and gallant man from such a terrible death."

Killing Snakes for a Living.

There resides at this place a celebrated hunter, trapper and snake-tamer, by the name of John Geer. He is married, and has a family of children. During the winter months Geer earns a living by hunting birds and trapping foxes, bears and other animals, for which this region is noted. His summers are spent in catching rattlesnakes, which are very numerous around Basket. Geer knows where there are several rattlesnake dens, and he frequently visits them with as much unconcern as though he was going on a whortleberry expedition. He has a dog that usually accompanies him to the mountain when on a rattlesnake hunt, which, by long practice, has acquired as great skill in dispatching the reptiles as the hunter and trapper himself.

While hunting and trapping pays, Geer says he can make far more money by killing rattlesnakes and selling the oil. He always carries a crotched stick. When he comes upon a snake, he carefully places the crotch over the reptile's neck, just back of the head. Then, if he desires to keep the snake alive, he removes the poison by the aid of instruments made for the purpose. But he seldom keeps the snake alive, but kills them, and has a regular process for extracting the oil from their bodies. This oil is very valuable, and sells readily for one dollar per ounce. It is said to have great curative powers. Geer says the present has been an exceedingly good year for snakes, and that he has killed nearly a hundred during the past three months. He claims that he can make a good living at the snake business. He is not afraid of the reptiles, and asserts that he can cure their bites without fail. —New York Times.

Woman's Strength.

The strength of women lies in their heart. It shows itself in their strong love and instinctive perception of right and wrong. Intellectual courage is rarely one of their virtues. As a rule, they are inclined to be restless and excitable, allowing their judgments and actions to be swayed by quick emotions of all kinds, but, above all, it is in their hopefulness and their endurance that they find their chief power. Who is the last person to give up hope in the case of a member of the family who has apparently gone altogether to the bad? What mother or sister with deep and ardent love for such will ever cease to cherish hope or endure suffering on their account? The patience of women is proverbial, and their whole lives are bound up in their affection. Few people will deny that love in one form or another makes up the beauty of life to woman. It enters into all she does. Any work outside her immediate circle is undertaken most often from pure desire to help some one else to know something of the mysterious happiness of love. Unlike men, women chiefly look for personal intercourse with those for whom they are working. If their interest lies among the poor, they are desirous of sympathetic personal acquaintance with them; and very little good work of a lasting kind has been done by women without their own influence of love being brought to bear on the individual case.—Nineteenth Century.

An Eel Story.

Not long since a well on the farm of Abner Welsh, near Orangeville, Pa., in consequence of impurities in the water, was cleaned, and when the water was pumped out there was found in the edge of the wall near the bottom the decaying remains of a large eel. The history of this eel runs as follows: In the summer of 1859 Joseph Huges, who then resided on this farm, caught a number of eels, among which was one enormous eel, which he took great pride in exhibiting to his neighbors. The eels were left over night in a vessel standing on the well floor and in the morning the large eel was gone. The natural supposition was that it had been stolen, but the truth was that it had squirmed out of the tub, worked its way through the floor and fell twenty-three feet into the water. Some years later it was seen by a man cleaning the well. On account of the sandy bottom and abundance of water all attempts to catch it were fruitless. From time to to time it was seen by persons cleaning the well, until this season, when, the water becoming tainted, the well was again cleaned and his remains were found. Before the visitation of this eel small lizards were so plentiful in the well that great care had to be taking in using the water. Since then scarcely any have been found till this summer. Now they have again made their appearance.

A Fatal Omission.

[From the Allegheny Evening Mail.]

"Do you know that neither of the platforms suits me?" said one of our old subscribers to us the other day. "As both parties seem to want health, strength and long life, more than anything else, they can not do better than have Hamburg Drops and St. Jacobs Oil planks included. With these they can weather all storms, political and domestic as well as dyspeptic and rheumatic." His logic was good and convinced us.

What He Had Done.

A local Talmage held a series of meetings near Amsterdam, Botetourt County, Va., in which he was quite successful. At the closing service of the meetings he rose for his farewell address. He spoke of "the great ingathering of souls" at a place of so little tendency to religion; of the many sheaves that had been gathered, whence he had heard only leaves could come. Walking rapidly back and forth, gesticulating furiously, he woke the echoes for miles around. Waving his bony hands above the congregation, he shouted: "I have done a good work here! I am like the celebrated Napoleon who upon an occasion of great success exclaimed, 'Sic semper tyrannis—I came, I saw, and I conquered!'"

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE date of the earliest eclipse of the sun, recorded in the annals of the Chinese, when "on the first day of the last month of autumn, the sun and moon did not meet harmoniously in Fang," or in that part of the heavens defined by two stars in the constellation of the Scorpion, has been determined by Prof. Von Oppolzer, of Vienna, to have been the morning of Oct. 26, 2187 B. C.

A CORRESPONDENT of the London Times gives the following singular but interesting information for the benefit of those who are interested in the study of the transmission of hereditary qualities: The following cases are taken from a list of seventeen candidates for election to an institution for the instruction of deaf and dumb children: 1. A. B. has six brothers and one sister, two of the brothers and the sister being deaf and dumb. 2. C. D. has four brothers and one sister, two of the brothers being also deaf and dumb. 3. E. F. has two brothers and one sister. Father, mother, two brothers, grandfather, two uncles and an aunt are deaf and dumb.

A RAPID penman can write thirty words in a minute. To do this he must draw his pen through the space of a rod, sixteen and a half feet. In forty minutes his pen travels a furlong. We make, on an average, sixteen curves or turns of the pen in writing each word. Writing thirty words in a minute, we must make 480 to each minute; in an hour, 28,800; in a day of only five hours, 144,000; in a year of 300 days, 43,200,000. The man who made 1,000,000 strokes with his pen was not at all remarkable. Many men, newspaper writers, for instance, make 4,000,000. Here we have, in the aggregate, a mark of 300 miles long to be traced on paper by such a writer in a year.

THE proportions of the human figure are six times the length of the feet. Whether the form is slender or plump, the rule holds good. Any deviation from it is a departure from the highest beauty in proportion. The Greeks made all their statues according to this rule. The face, from the highest point of the forehead, where the hair begins, to the chin, is one-tenth of the stature. The hand, from the wrist to the middle of the forefinger, is the same. From the top of the chest to the highest point of the forehead is a seventh. If the face, from the roots of the hair to the chin, is divided into three equal parts, the first division determines the place where the eyebrows meet, and the second the place of the nostrils. The height from the feet to the top of the head is the distance from the extremity of the fingers when the arms are extended.

The Comptes Rendus of the French Academy contains a remarkable paper by M. Faye on the physical forces which have produced the present figure of the earth. After remarking on the use of the pendulum in determining the figure of the earth from series of measurements of the intensity and direction of the gravitation force at different parts of the earth's surface, he draws attention to the very curious fact that while the direction and intensity of gravity are affected perceptibly by the presence of hills such as Schichallion and Arthur's Seat, or even by masses as small as the great pyramid of Gizeh, gigantic mountains such as the Himalayas, and great elevated plateaux and table-lands, do not affect the pendulum indications in any sensible manner, except in certain cases where upon elevated continents there appears to be a veritable defect of attraction instead of the excess which might be expected. Indeed, the observations are sufficiently striking to seem to point to the supposition that not only under every great mountain, but even under the whole of every large continent, there were enormous cavities. More than this, the attraction at the surface of all the great oceans appear too great to agree with the distribution presumed by Clairaut's formula, which is exact enough for most purposes. Sir G. Airy's suggestion that the base of the Himalaya range reaches down into the denser liquid interior, and there displaces a certain amount of that liquid, so that the exterior attraction is thereby lessened, is one which, inherently improbable, fails to have any application in explaining why the attraction above the seas should be greater than over the continents. M. Faye propounds the following solution to the difficulty: Under the oceans the globe cools more rapidly and to a greater depth than beneath the surface of the continents. At a depth of 4,000 meters (13,000 feet) the ocean will still have a temperature not remote from 0 degree C., while at a similar depth beneath the earth's crust the temperature would be not far from 150 degrees C. (allowing 108 feet in depth down for an increase of one degree in the internal temperature). If the earth had but one uniform rate of cooling all over it, it would be reasonable to assume that the solidified crust would have the same thickness and the same average density all over it. It is therefore argued that below the primitive oceans the earth's crust assumed a definite solid thickness before the continents, and that in contracting, these thicker portions exercised pressure upon the fluid nucleus tending to elevate still further the continents. This hypothesis, M. Faye thinks, will, moreover, explain the unequal distribution of land and sea around the two poles, the general rise and fall of continents being determined by the excess of density of the crust below the oceans, and by the line or points of least resistance to internal pressure being at the middle continents or at the margin of oceans.

Carriages Without Horses.

A Hartford gentleman has nearly completed a carriage for use on ordinary roads, to be propelled solely by compressed air. The shafts, of course, are omitted, but otherwise the carriage will resemble in the main, those commonly used. The machinery, in very compact form, is under the rear axle, and the air will be taken into it from a reservoir in sufficient quantity to furnish motive power for a run of many miles.

A WELL-KNOWN local preacher in a suburban town, while instructing a class of urchins in the cathechism, told them that God could do everything, whereupon one of them asked, "Can God make a rock so big that He can't lift it?" The boy's question remains unanswered.

Curious Composition.

The following rather curious piece of composition was recently placed upon the blackboard at a teachers' institute in Vermont, and a prize of a "Webster's Dictionary" offered to any person who could read it and pronounce every word correctly. The book was not carried off, however, as twelve was the lowest number of mistakes in pronunciation made: "A sacrilegious son of Belial, who suffered from bronchitis, having exhausted his finances, in order to make good the deficit, resolved to ally himself to a comely, lenient and docile young lady of the Malay or Caucasian race. He accordingly purchased a calliope and coral necklace of a chameleon hue, and securing a suit of rooms at a principal hotel, he engaged the head-waiter as his coadjutor. He then dispatched a letter of the most unexceptional caligraphy extant, inviting the young lady to a matinee. She revolted at the idea, refused to consider herself sacrificeable to his desires, and sent a polite note of refusal, on receiving which he procured a carbine and a bowie-knife, said that he would not now forge fetters hymeneal with the Queen, went to an isolated spot, severed his jugular vein, and discharged the contents of his carbine into his abdomen. The debris were removed by the Coroner." The mistakes in pronunciation were made on the following words: Sacrilegious, Belial, bronchitis, exhausted, finances, deficit, comely, lenient, docile, Malay, calliope, chameleon, suit, coadjutor, caligraphy, matinee, sacrificable, carbine, hymeneal, isolated, jugular and debris.

A Novel Horseshoe.

A Berlin manufacturer is making a horseshoe of iron and hemp that is receiving considerable favor among the Germans. The shoe is of malleable iron carrying a deep wide groove, into which tarred hemp rope is firmly wedged. The rope is so thick that it protrudes beyond the rim of iron. The shoe is very light, and is said to be serviceable.

TO BUSINESS MEN.

The Text of a Circular Soon to be Issued By the Democrats.

S. S. Cox, in introducing Governor Seymour at New York, last Friday night, read the following circular, to which the democratic committee proposes to secure the signatures of a large number of prominent business men before issuing it for distribution:

> To crown the effort at reform and perfect the change in the administration of public affairs by the election of a democratic president is a promise of good and not a menace of evil.

The republican party, having been called to account by the people, and being wholly unable to justify itself before the country, is seeking to befog the issue by wholesale abuse of its opponents. Its charges against the democrats have one after another fallen to the ground or recoiled upon itself, and it is now driven, as its last resource, to a general plea that any change in the administration of public affairs is likely by some occult influence to paralyze industry, restrict trade and commerce and turn back the swelling tide of national prosperity. This plea has less to support it than the "baseless fabric of a vision." It is not only opposed by the fact that every material interest throughout the land has been far more prosperous since the republicans became a minority in both houses of congress than during any other period in which they remained in control of these legislative bodies, but is refuted also by every page of the past history of the country. The democratic party, from the days of Jefferson to the present hour, has marked every accession to power by the fresh impulse it has given to national prosperity. Its financial theories, once so bitterly opposed, have stood the test of the century. It gave the country the first and only trustworthy and acceptable system of managing the public finances and maintaining the public credit, and the subtreasury of to-day is an enduring monument of its financial wisdom and sagacity. Trade and commerce, labor and capital have made their safest ventures and reaped their richest rewards under democratic rule. The democratic party has not, to-day, in its creed or platforms, its theories or practice, a single menace for any legitimate industry. It is eminently conservative in all its purposes and aims. It is opposed to bigotry and intolerance, to sectional hates and jealousies and bitter enmities growing out of past controversies, but it proposes no backward step to settle these differences and pacify the country. It seeks to unite all hearts of every section and race in a common purpose and effort to make these United States the home of a free, industrious, thriving and happy people. We honestly believe that when the change in the administration, so auspiciously begun in the election of a democratic majority to the house of congress, shall be completed by the installation of the brave, honest, untainted and sagacious candidates for the presidency and vice-presidency selected at Cincinnati, the consequent harmony and good feeling will be highly favorable to every material interest in all parts of the land, and the prosperity of the country will be fully assured and established. We therefore most heartily recommend the election of Hancock and English.

What It Costs.

Do the hard-working, tax-paying people of the United States realize that, at the present time, the entire machinery of the government, which they support, is used in the most indecent and profligate manner to maintain the supremacy of a political party?

Mr. Rutherford B. Hayes receives a salary of $50,000 a year, for performing the duties laid down by the constitution and defined by the statutes for the executive of the nation. He is now on a campaign tour in the western portion of the country, working for the election of Mr. Garfield to the presidency. He is still in the employ of the people, under contract and under oath, to work for the whole people, and he is working for a section of the people only. If any citizen of the United States goes to Washington to do business that requires executive approval or endorsement, he cannot do it.

Mr. Hayes has seven cabinet officers who receive an aggregate salary of $56,000 a year. These men have left their posts of duty to engage in the same sort of work as their chief. Their offices are in charge of subordinates, and any citizen who desires to see a cabinet minister on official business is informed that he is "out of town." For three months no cabinet meeting has witnessed three regular members of the cabinet in consultation with the executive.

There are in the employ of the people of the United States, at present, in the departments in Washington, and in the various custom-houses, postoffices, internal revenue districts and elsewhere throughout the land, more than 100,000 people. These have been assessed two per cent. of their salaries which the taxpayers give them to constitute a corporation fund by which to debauch the suffrage of freemen, and elect by corrupt means a man who represents everything that is debasing in our political system. This assessment is collected by agents of the government, who make the payment of his proportion a condition of each employe's tenure of office.

Wherever a government employe, who receives a fixed salary from the people, for performing his duty in the public service, is capable of making speeches or doing any other species of campaign work, he is drafted into the service of the republican party, and sent out to influence votes by his eloquence, or to distribute the corruption fund in his party's treasury. He has his expenses paid out of the public money, and draws his salary from the people's taxes while doing duty as a partisan politician.

Campaign documents, intended for service in the interests of the republican party, are printed in the government printing-office in Washington, or the branch office in the treasury department, at the public expense. The people of the United States pay for the maintenance of these establishments, for the paper used and the labor employed; but a partisan administration, which came into power by fraud, turns them into campaign workshops for the benefit of only one section of the people, and that section a minority.

Government clerks who are not available on the stump, or in any other branch of the party service, are detailed to mail these documents to all parts of the land, and, while engaged in this work, they are still in the employ of the people of the United States, who pay their salaries regularly. The postoffice department transports this class of literature free, while the people pay the bills.

Representatives of the government stationed at foreign capitals, who receive from the people princely salaries, and who submit large bills of expense yearly, have been given leave of absence to come home and take the stump for Garfield. If they have any duties abroad, they are neglected or left to the discretion of subordinates.

The country is overrun with government employes, who leave their posts of duty, by order of their superior officers, to manipulate conventions and caucuses, bribe and intimidate voters, and in other ways labor to destroy the last vestiges of free suffrage and popular government, which remain after twenty years of republican misrule. And the expenses of all this horde of sharpers must be paid by the people of the United States in one way or another. Even the worst days of Grantism presented no such spectacle.

And all this is not only tolerated, but directed by a hypocritical administration which entered on its duties with the following proclamation, issued from the executive mansion on the 22d day of June, 1877:

> "No officer should be required or permitted to take part in the management of political organizations, caucuses, conventions or election campaigns. Their right to vote and express their views on public questions, either orally or through the press, is not denied, provided it does not interfere with the discharge of their official duties. No assessments for political purposes on officers or subordinates should be allowed. This rule is applicable to every department of the civil service. It should be understood by every officer of the general government that he is expected to conform his conduct to its requirements."

Literary Absorption.

[Paris American Register.]

The following illustrates how a reader may become so wrapped up in a romance as to live with its heroes and heroines and learn to regard them as real beings—which is very much the same experience as that which Charles Dickens claimed to have whenever he was engaged in writing one of his long novels. A friend of mine in Vienna, many years ago, had purchased for his wife "Dombey and Son," and the lady was ardently engaged in reading it, and had reached the chapter wherein the misfortunes of Mr. Dombey begin to accumulate—the elopement of his haughty second wife, Ethel; the sudden disappearance of his confidential clerk, Carker, and the bankrupcy of his proud firm. Just then a great failure of one of the largest banking-houses in Vienna occured, and that day Mr.—came home, and rushing into his wife's boudoir, said: "Oh! Annie, just think of it! Arnstein & Eskeles have failed!" The lady looked up for an instant from her reading, and remarked, sympathetically: "So have Dombey & Son!" This last bit of news interested the husband, of course, though it was hardly of as much pecuniary importance to him as the other failure.

A Popular and Reliable Company.

As to the soundness and standing of the Ohio Farmers' Insurance Company, the Indiana Farmer has the following editorial in the issue of May 29, 1880:

"Some of the foreign insurance companies are waging a war on the Ohio Farmers' Fire Insurance Company in this state, and report all manner of things about it. We had occasion to examine its reports and papers on file in the office of the Auditor of State this week, as well as those of other companies, and we found its affairs were frankly and freely open to the world, and that its condition compares favorably with other companies. We examined them with a view of ascertaining how much truth there was in statements of other and interested companies, and we believe that the company is sound, and does business safely. The fact that for 32 years it has promptly paid all losses, and accumulated nearly a million of capital besides, is a bit of practical experience in its favor that cannot be whistled down at a breath. It seems that the cause of the war and jealously is, that this company has become very popular among the farmers of the west, and taking no city or conflagration risks, can and does issue policies for less than the rates of some other companies."

The principal office of the company above named is located at Le Roy, Medina county, Ohio. Mr. C. G. Sheppard is the soliciting agent for DeKalb county, Indiana and Defiance county, Ohio. For full particulars concerning the company, address F. M. Thompson, general agent, Hicksville, O. 24-tf

A ROUSING WORD.

It Got Into Scripture, Into Magna Charta and Under a Hundred Thrones.

Moreover, It Wont Do to Abuse a Scoundrel If He Is Only A Candidate.

Talmage's Eloquent Description of the Hypocritical Republican Press of the United States.

BROOKLYN, Oct. 24.—This morning's services in Brooklyn Tabernacle were opened by singing:

"My country 'tis of thee,
Sweet land of liberty,
Of thee I sing."

Dr. Talmage, taking his text from Galatians v. 13,—"Brethren ye have been called unto liberty, only use not liberty for an occasion of the flesh"—preached as follows:

"THE PRESIDENTIAL CONTEST."

We are on the eve of the quadrennial presidential excitement, and this morning and next sabbath morning, as a christian patriot, I have some earnest things to say. I have no partisan fetter on either hand or either foot. The instructions come neither from Chicago nor Cincinnati, but from the throne of God. It is fortunate that the ministry in this country is not tempted by governmental patronage. There are lands where the state does everything for the church. St. Peter's at Rome has cost the government $200,000,000. Xerxes took from the temple of Belus $100,000,000 of gold. England pays $75,000 a year to her archbishop of Canterbury and $770,000 in all to her bishops, while 18,000 of her ministers are paid by the government. Our ministers have no such temptation to surrender private judgment to the dictation of the state, but still clergymen have powerful pressure to make them think this way or that, preach this way or that, and vote this way or that. Yet the minister of religion must shake off the prejudices of the hour, and rise above the instructions both of his congregation and of the printing press, and take his message from the Lord.

There is one word in my text that stirs the blood of every genuine man, and that word is liberty. "Ye have been called unto liberty." Paul wrote that under Nero the tyrant, hated of all ages; the emperor, who, incognito, roamed the streets at night for the pleasure of robbing passengers, bedaubing christians with tar and pitch, and setting them on fire to light up his parks, kicking his own wife until she died, and having his own mother assassinated, and finally committed suicide. No wonder that word "liberty," under such a bad man, cost Paul his head, but while the emperor destroyed the man who dared to use so insurrectionary a word, the word itself was indestructible, and has been the most arousing and revolutionary word ever written. It got into the magna charta and made England free; into the declaration of independence and started this nation on its high career; into the speech of Ghribaldi and the proclamation of Victor Emanuel, and Italy shook off the dust of the grave; into France and overthrew the Napoleonic dynasty; under a hundred despotic thrones and will keep them rocking until they fall flat. It took hold of the printing press and broke its shackles and make it the mightiest agency for intelligence and evangelization that the world has ever known. That word will keep on its rounds until in all the earth there shall not be a tyrant's sceptre, or a slave's chain, or an oppressed workman, or a blighted intellect. Liberty for the state! Liberty for the church! Liberty for the printing press! Liberty for the pulpits! Liberty for the platform! Liberty for all continents, for all islands, for all zones, for all ages! "Brethren ye have been called unto liberty."

Yet, my text has not only a driving-wheel, but a brake, not only an inspiration, but a limitation. "Brethren ye have been called unto liberty, only use not liberty for an occasion of the flesh." Liberty, but not wild license. Liberty, but not moral recklessness.

First, I charge you, so far as I am your teacher and pastor, to have nothing to do in this presidential contest with slanderous implication of public men. Take up the newspaper files of the last eighty years and see that the people of the United States have felt called upon to utter whispered malediction of dignitaries. All those men who have passed into the gallery of national saintbood were called in their day to go chin deep through the slush of lampoonery and pasquinade and there was no exception. Thomas Paine wrote and published a letter to George Washington, the first president, and said: "Treacherous in private friendship and a hypocrite in private life, the world will be puzzled to decide whether you are an apostate or an impostor, whether you abandoned good principles or whether you never had any." John Quincy Adams consoled himself with the thought that he had no more misrepresentation and scandal to go through with than his father, John Adams, and declares during his presidential campaign that there must be some people who give their entire time to making lies about him. March 4, 1861, the day of Thomas Jefferson's inauguration as president, the Sentinel, of Boston, had this deriding epitaph: "Monumental inscription—Yesterday expired, deeply regretted by millions of grateful Americans and by all good men, the federal administration of the government of the United States, animated by a Washington, an Adams, a Hamilton, Knox, Pickering, Wolcott, McHenry, Marshall, Stoddard and Dexter; age twelve years. As one tribute of gratitude in these times, this monument to the talents and services of the deceased is raised by the Sentinel." During Andrew Jackson's candidacy the country was flooded with coffin hand-bills representing six dead men, in reference to the fact that General Jackson, in time of war, had ordered six militia men shot for desertion, and he was also pictorialized as receiving a scepter from the devil. Martin Van Buren was caricatured as a rat; Thomas Benton and Amos Kendall as robbers hurling a battering-ram against the door of the United States bank. I saw last summer in a museum at Put-in-Bay a newspaper, dated 1844, calling Henry Clay a libertine, a murderer, a hypocrite and a blackleg. How much rough treatment on the part of the world was suggested by Mr. Clay's allusion to Kentucky, when he said: "I seemed to be assailed by all the rest of the world. She interposed her broad and impenetrable shield, repelling the poisoned shafts that were aimed for my destruction, and vindicated my good name from every malignant and unfounded aspersion." Theodore Frelinghuysen, the illustrious New Jerseyman on the same ticket with Henry Clay, was called a "vinegar-faced Presbyterian," although no more genial man ever lived. Daniel Webster, under political assault and neglect, died of a broken heart at Marshfield. At his nomination for the presidency the derisive cry was: "Who is James K. Polk," although he had been a long while in the councils of the nation and speaker of the house of representatives. I tell you now who he was—the man who added Texas, in some respects, the richest of all the states in the Union, and did more than any other man in this country to open our way to the possession of every thing clear to the Pacific coast. Yet there were millions of people, who, during his administration, never mentioned his name without a sneer of contempt. There is not a man in mid-life who does not remember the fact that all the terms of obloquy were heaped upon Abraham Lincoln. The filthy joker, the wholesale butchers the buffoon, the gorrilla of the white house, were the gentler and more refined of the epithets.

ALL THESE MEN

have taken places in history, honorable and radiant. But we are still at the old business of base travesty. We have our dictionaries out hunting up more terms of political damnation. Two men are set up for the presidency, both eminent—one in the field, the other in the councils of the nation—and both, I believe, good men. Yet, what do I hear in regard to them? Of one I am told he unjustly and gladly hung Mrs. Surratt; that he is ignorant of public affairs; that, crossing the field of battle once with an oath, he neglected wounded soldiers, that he was engaged in an oil swindle; that he is weak and ambitious for the presidency, and will do anything unprincipled to gain it; has a bee in his bonnet, and so on, and so on, and so on. I am told of the other that he took counsel fees which he ought not to have received; that he took stock in credit-mobilier knowing it to be a national swindle, and on door-steps and the side of houses I see written in chalk the amount he is said to have acquired by the knavery to be $329. Now I would like to gather all the first-class of anathema into one grave and on the monument above it I would put the epitaph: "Here lies the family of republican lies. Requiescat in peace!" And into another grave I would like to gather the other class of anathema and upon the monument above I would put the epitaph: "Here rest the family of democratic lies. Requiescat in peace!" Have you any idea that the slander of opposing candidates will in any way forward your party? I tell you nay. There is something in human nature that puts it in sympathy with the traduced. Falsehoods rebound and hurt those who utter them more than those against whom they are uttered. If I had a scale delicate enough to weigh detamation, I would tell you in one minute who will be the next president of the United States. I would put all the scurrility against Hancock on one side of the scale, and all the scurrility against Garfield on on the other side of the scale, and the man most abused would be the next president. It seems that as soon as a man is put up for office—city, state or national—he is to be made the target. The fact that he is up seems to be proof positive that he ought to be brought down. His private life as well as his public is put under scrutiny, and all the electric-lights turned on, and if there can be anything that can be twisted into seeming wrong, multitudes of people rejoice over it as though they had discovered a new star, or found a new invention.

And here let me say some of the newspaper presses of the country are mistaking wild license for liberty. There are newspapers whose entire business is calumny. Their columns are stuffed with it. Their editorials reek with it. Their reportorial corps are charged to bring home nothing but putrefaction. They will pay more for one quill full of filth than for a hogshead of healtey product. They turn the end of the city sewers into their editorial inkstand. They breakfast and dine and sup on indecency. They roll in it as swine in the mire. Unclean literary wretches, the quill they write with was plucked neither from a goose nor from an eagle, but from the turkey-buzzard. Ghouls! Ghouls! The alleviating fact in regard to all this is that they make a recoil in behalf of righteousness. There are papers in New York so vile that their denunciation amounts to first-class eulogy. I want no better commendation of public men than that certain journals assail them. Such papers, bad enough at other times, quadruple their wickedness during the presidential election. The time will come when decent people will refuse to patronize such newspapers, or be seen with them in hand, and when literary and political sin does not pay, such publications will cease. Have nothing to do, pen, type or tongue, with the detraction of public men. Can it be that you have so little vision that you cannot see, that in this national canvass there are tremendous principles to discuss?

I would call your attention from the work of the political scavenger to the work of

THE CHRISTIAN POLITICIAN.

There is, this autumn, one question that is as high above all others as Mt. Blanc is above an ant hill—the question of common schools, as compared with it, nothing the tariff question, as compared with it, nothing: the Chinese question, as compared with it, nothing, and that is, how to turn the solid south and the solid north into a national unity. You may as well have a solid east against a solid west, as a solid north against a solid south. The republican party says: "Elect our man and the sectional strife will be over." The democratic party says: "Elect our man and the sectional strife will be over." Now, I call you out from the work of mean and base personalities to settle that one central question on the first Tuesday in November. Discuss it; pray over it; vote with reference to it. It is high time that this sectional strife ended. Massachusetts and Alabama, after a long divorce, need to be married; the Penobscot and the Appalachicola need to find out that they are sisters. For the sake of civilization, religion and the financial and moral welfare of our nation, break up this aggravating line between the two sections. Let the people go down and come up to the national cemeteries at Richmond and Murfreesboro, and by the graves of the blue and the gray forgive and forget, and pray and embrace each other. Surely fifty years of quarrels are enough; bad blood enough; national debt enough; graves enough; widowhood enough; orphanage enough; agony and woe enough. I hope that we are having the last political platform in which there shall be any mention of north or south. If we are to be in perpetual wrangle and from age to age, I think it would have been better to have let the south go in 1861. Your fathers and brothers who imperiled and lost their lives in that great contest fought to keep the south, not that we might be in more convenient antagonism, but with the hope that in the future there might be a unity and good understanding. Look out how any of you defeat the object for which that great holocaust was enacted.

Let the sections visit each other, and, as the brigadier generals of the south have during the last month stood in Cooper institute, New York, so before the election has passed let brigadier generals of the north stand in the great halls of Charleston and New Orleans. Let northern men escape the wintry blasts by a trip to the orange groves of Florida, and Georgians the torrid blasts of summer by a visit to Saratoga and Long Branch. As once you came face to face to destroy each other, now come face to face to bless. Once you crossed swords, now cross palms. Let not the sun of this generation go down on our national wrath. Before we who are now in mid-life lay our heads in death may we see the whole nation pacified. We cannot well sleep our last sleep until those angry sectional voices are hushed forever. They would disturb our pillow of dust. Be still, the north! Be still, the south! Be still, the east! Be still, the west, and let the united nation do homage to God of the Maine forest and Florida lagoons, Michigan wheat-fields and South Carolina rice swamps; New Jersey peach orchard and Mississippi plantation. Let the ballot-box of the first Tuesday in November be the altar upon which we shall sacrifice all our sectional hates, and the throne on which national unity shall begin her beneficient sway.

You see that the first of my two sermons on the coming presidential contest has for its design, first, to call you away from defamation of public men; second, to concentrate your attention upon the one great question as to how best we shall obliterate all sectional antipathies.

THERE ARE THREE REASONS

why we are bound to do our best for this country—our fathers' graves, our own cradles, our children's birthright. When I say our fathers' graves, I make your pulses run quicker. Whether they rest in city cemetery or village graveyard their ashes are precious. They lived well and died right. We will never submit to have their tombs dishonored by the reign of any other government than under the one which they lived and died. Yes, this land was our cradle. We may have been in it roughly rocked, but still it was a a good cradle to be rocked in. How much we owe it! Dear land of our boyhood and girlhood days! Yes, it is to be our children's birthright. We will soon be done with it. We will not see many more of its spring blossoms, or reap many more of its summer harvests, or gather much more of its centennial fruits. But our children! They must get it from us as we got it from our fathers—a free land, a happy land, a christian land. We cannot have them trod on of despotism, or lashed of cruelties, or affrighted of anarchy. We hand this country to them over the ballot-box, over the desk of the school-room, over the church altar, and charge them to put their own life between it and any seen stroke that would destroy it.

And now, Lord God Almighty, we lay hold of Thee in a thousand-armed prayer. Remember how for this land our fathers walked with bleeding feet through Valley Forge. Remember the hunger and the thirst and the cold, and the long march and the fever hospital. Remember the charge up Bunker Hill. Remember Marion and Kosciusco. Remember Lexington and Yorktown and King's mountain and Gettysburg. Look upon the lake where Perry fought, and Hampton Roads, where the Cumberland went down. Remember Washington praying by the camp-fires. Remember Plymouth rock and the landing among savages. Remember Independence Hall, and how much it cost our fathers to sign their names. Remember all the tears and blood of three wars—1776 and 1812 and 1861. Yes, remember the groan that was mightier than all the other groans, and the thirst that was sharper than all the other thirsts, and the wounds deeper than all the other wounds, and the death ghastlier than all other deaths; the mount where Jesus died to make men happy and free, and for the sake of all this human and divine sacrifice, have mercy on this nation; and whosoever would blot it out, whosoever would cut it down, and whosoever would turn it back, let him be accursed!

Go home in high hope. The car of national progress will never roll backward. God is on the side of this nation.

"He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment seat;
Oh, be swift, my soul, to answer Him! Be jubilant, my feet;
Our God is marching on."

OBITUARY.

Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, the Distinguished Authoress.

Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, of much distinction in American literature and public life, died yesterday morning at Wayland, Mass. She was a daughter of David Francis, and was born in Medford, Mass., February 11, 1802. When twenty she wrote "Hobomok," her first book, the next year, "The Rebels," both successful works. At twenty-two she began the publication of the "Juvenile Miscellany," a monthly, which she edited for eight years. In 1828 she published the "Frugal Housewife," and, during the next twenty years, numerous biographies of famous women, several anti-slavery works, "Philothea," a classical novel, "The Progress of Religious Ideas," a work upon which she was wisely disposed to rest her fame, and many stories of a high moral tone for children. Mrs. Child early devoted herself to the anti-slavery movement, and remained true to it to her last hour. In 1831 several women of high social position or noted ability, took part in the movement, and of these Mrs. Child was most distinguished. She had in 1828 married David Lee Child, an able lawyer. In 1841 they took up their residence in New York, and for several years conducted a powerful organ, the National Anti-Slavery Standard. In 1800 Mrs. Child interested herself warmly in the effort to purchase and set free the slave, Thomas Sims, whose capture at Boston and return to slavery is well remembered. During the civil war Mrs. Child was an earnest laborer in the Union cause, and did her part in bringing the public mind up to a recognition of the chief requirement of the time, that slavery should be abolished. She exerted herself strenuously in behalf of the freemen, and devoted much time and literary labor to their cause. In 1867 she published a story entitled "The Romance of the Republic," illustrative of the workings of slavery, which proved very popular. Her husband's death preceded hers, and she left no children.

Our Mother.

A mother's influence follows us through life. Other faces may fade away and be forgotten, but hers will live forever in our memory. How many times when the tempter lures us on, desiring our ruin, has the memory of a mother's words and prayers and yearning tenderness turned our hearts to that which is pure and right! How immensely powerful is a mother's influence in the family circle! Her little children come to her daily, telling her of the little trials and vexations that they meet with. And although she may not remove the burdens from their hearts, yet by her tenderness she allays the pain, and makes their burdens easier to bear. No one knows so well how to soothe their little griefs. No earthly hand like a mother's can guide us so safely; no voice like a mother's ever falls so sweetly on the ear, and no other heart beats with such tenderness.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

John Duff, the builder of the Hannibal and St. Joe and Union Pacific railroads, died at Jamaica Plains, N. Y., last week. He leaves property estimated at $4,000,000.... Michael O'Hearn, a man of considerable wealth, who resided at Pittsfield, Mass., stabbed his wife to death, and then committed suicide.

Kenwood Philp was arrested in New York, Oct. 27, on a charge of forging the Garfield-Morey Chinese cheap-labor letter. Philp is one of the editors of Truth, a daily paper in which the letter was first printed.

C. Risley & Co., coffee dealers in New York, have failed for $800,000, mainly on account of a shrinkage in the value of goods.... The Ansonia watch and clock works, Brooklyn, N. Y., said to have been the most complete of the kind in the United States, and having been in operation for only fourteen months, were destroyed by fire last week. The loss is over $1,000,000, and the insurance $400,000.

Philp, who was arrested in New York on a charge of forging the Garfield-Morey letter, was arraigned for trial on the 28th ult. Hart, one of the proprietors of Truth, appeared on the witness-stand, but refused to produce the letter. He was handed over to a Police Captain for contempt of court. At the afternoon session the original letter was shown, but the prosecution demanded the envelope, and an adjournment was necessary to secure it. Col. A. F. Rockwell, of the United States army; James McDermott, of Brooklyn, journalist; ex-Sheriff Dagget, of Brooklyn; and Daniel F. Ames, an expert, testified that they believed the Morey letter was in the handwriting of Philp.

A fire at Lynn, Mass., burned several factories, involving a loss of about $150,000.

THE WEST.

J. B. Doyle, one of the most expert and extensive counterfeiters in the United States, was arrested in Chicago, the other day, by officers of the Secret Service. He had in his possession over $200,000 spurious Government bonds of the issue of 1861, and so well were they executed that a number of bankers and experts to whom they were submitted pronounced them genuine. Simultaneously with the arrest of Doyle, Chas. H. Smith, the engraver of the bond plates and an employe of the American Bank Note Company, was taken in custody at New York. Another member of the gang is also reported to have been arrested in New York. The Secret-Service operatives have been after them for years, losing them every now and then on account of their roving disposition, but were unable to get sufficient evidence to warrant their arrest. In 1875 they were located in Bradford, Ill., where Doyle married a daughter of Dr. Foster, at one time a noted counterfeiter. For the last three or four years Doyle has been living on a farm in Colorado.

The great conflict between the Wabash and the other Western railroads from Chicago is ended, which, in the space of one week, forced passenger rates to and from all Western points down to the lowest figures ever experienced in the history of railroads in this country. Hereafter passenger earnings are to be pooled between Chicago and Southwestern points....Luke Walton murdered his daughter at River Falls, Wis., last September, and made his escape. He has just been arrested. He confesses killing his daughter, and, until arrested, supposed he had killed both of them. The youngest, although terribly wounded, recovered. Walton says he did the terrible deed to prevent the daughters coming to shame or starvation through poverty..... The killing of Victoria, with sixty of his warriors and eighteen women and children, and the capture of sixty-eight women and children, is communicated to Gen. Hatch by the Mexican General Terrazas, who reports thirty of the band still at large. There are 1,800 Mexican and 800 American soldiers now on the southern border of New Mexico.

George Lovett, of Charleston, Mo., quarreled with his wife about some property belonging to her, beat her brains out with a flat-iron, and then cut his own throat from ear to ear....William L. Church, a pioneer merchant of Chicago, is dead. He had resided in that city since it was an Indian trading post, and held various positions of honor and trust.... A gravel train on the Cairo and Vincennes railroad jumped the track sixteen miles from Cairo, wrecking nine or ten cars and killing one man outright, wounding two so severely as to render amputation of their limbs necessary, and seriously if not fatally wounding three or four others....Elias Simkins, Chief of Police of Pittsfield, Ill., was shot and killed by Elliott Baker, whom he was attempting to arrest.

A dispatch from Leadville, Col., says: "The body of Michael Hendricks, said to be a nephew of Gov. Hendricks, of Indiana, was found murdered two miles from here. The murder is supposed to have been committed by two McCullum brothers, young Hendricks having been implicated in the murder of their brother, and acquitted."

A San Francisco dispatch says the three highwaymen, Mays, Hicks and another, who escaped from the Idaho penitentiary, and killed two of their pursuers, have been captured near Salmon Falls and returned to prison.

A horrible tragedy is reported from Wabashaw county, Minn. Robert Lowe shot his wife and infant child, and then went into the brush about a mile from his residence and killed himself. The ball passed through Mrs. Lowe's heart, killing her almost instantly. The child, 2 years old, was shot in the head a little above the temple, and survived about an hour and a half. The murderer shot himself in the back of the head, at the base of the brain, and no doubt died immediately. Domestic trouble was the cause of the tragedy.

Fears of an Indian outbreak have caused Gunnison City to be placed under control of three volunteer militia companies.... Charles Throop and Henry Munn, who were employed in painting the outside of the Public Library building at Cincinnati, fell from a scaffold eighty feet above the sidewalk, and were instantly killed.

THE SOUTH.

Henry Williams, colored, has been hanged at Newton, N. C., for the murder of Harrison Kinder, a fellow-workingman....In consequence of the long-continued drought in the valley of the Delaware the water in that river is unprecedentedly low. The river can be easily forded at several points. Nearly all the mills in the river valley worked by water-power have been closed, and malarial fevers arising from the stagnant waters are prevalent.

Press Stanley and Tom McClure, two farmers, had a difficulty in Morganton, Ga., and when on the way home at midnight Stanley drew a revolver and killed McClure. Two men were along, and Stanley cocked his pistol and made them both swear they would not tell who killed McClure, and that if he was ever arrested they would testify in his favor. A woman who witnessed the difficulty walked ten miles to town to tell of it.

A merchant of Woodland, Carroll county, Va., named Allison, suspected Hawks, his partner, of undue intimacy with his wife. One morning he told Mrs. Allison he was going from home for a few days. Instead of going as he pretended, he secreted himself in the vicinity of his home, returned late at night, and found his wife in Hawks' room. Allison drew his revolver, shot Hawks dead, and lodged two bullets in his wife's body, inflicting serious but not necessarily fatal wounds.

Danville, Va., has been having an epidemic of crime. Within the short space of forty-eight hours five murders were committed in that town. Mary Mitchell was fatally shot by her paramour, Barton Smith. John Ramey killed Denis Marooney. They quarreled about a dog. David Graves and Ed Coleman got into a difficulty about the wife of the former, and Coleman was fatally shot. Scott Hankins was murdered by unknown parties, and his body thrown into the canal. A peddler named Haggerty put an end to the existence of another peddler named Conrad with a club.

WASHINGTON.

The Secretary of the Interior has decided that the St. Louis census shall be retaken, and Calvin M. Woodward is to be appointed Supervisor for that purpose.

A Washington telegram says there is some embarrassment relative to the capture of the Victoria band in Mexico. The indications from the information already received at the War Department are that the Mexican Government does not desire to retain those Indians, claiming that they belong to the United States, and certainly our Government does not wish to provide for them.

The excess of exports over imports of merchandise, stated in specie values, for the nine months ending Sept. 30, were $73,760,430. The excess in the corresponding nine months of 1879 was $161,498,336. The excess of imports of gold and silver coin and bullion during the nine months ending Sept. 30, 1880, was $29,529,705; corresponding months of 1879, $25,461,732....Sitting Bull has made application to the War Department for terms of surrender. Gen. Terry is said to have been given full power to arrange the terms of the surrender, and to otherwise act in the matter.

GENERAL.

The Canada Pacific syndicate has at last finished its formal contract to construct the road within ten years, but the terms will not be made public until the meeting of Parliament.

Dr. Tanner, the hero of the forty days' fast, is going to London, where he will enter upon another long starvation match for the edification of the Englishmen.

Wm. P. Adair, a Cherokee chief, who commanded a brigade of his race in the Confederate army, died at Washington last week....William H. Vanderbilt has presented Capt. Stone, of Cincinnati, the manager of Maud S., with a silver vase holding a relief portrait in gold of the peerless mare; Bair, the trainer, with a magnificent gold watch; and the groom with $500 in greenbacks.

Col. Terrassas, the officer who commanded the Mexican force that put an end to the career of the notorious Apache chief Victoria, in his official report of the affair says: "On the 14th, in the afternoon, I attacked Victoria's band in the Castillo mountains, and I surrounded him on the next morning. By a simultaneous attack we took his position, leaving Victoria and sixty warriors and eighteen women and children dead, with sixty-eight women and children, and two captive prisoners recovered. One hundred and eighty animals of different kinds and all the arms and plunder were left in my possession. I lost three men dead and twelve wounded."

Wm. Cawthrow, an old and wealthy resident of Toronto, is dead. He leaves property estimated at $6,000,000.....Sara Bernhardt, the celebrated French actress, has arrived at New York, and will visit the principal cities of this country in a professional capacity.....The total number of immigrants who landed in the United States during the month of September was nearly 55,000.

Recent deaths: The Hon. E. D. Mansfield, a veteran newspaper writer and author, well known to readers of the New York Times as "Veteran Observer," and to those of the Cincinnati Gazette as "E. D. M.," in Morrow county, Ohio, aged 80; Capt. J. J. Warman, an old Ohio and Mississippi river steamboatman, at Memphis, Tenn., aged 70; Bishop D. S. Daggett, of the Methodist church, at Richmond, Va.; Hon. John S. Brazee, a leading member of the Ohio bar, at Lancaster, Ohio, aged 80....Mrs. Abraham Lincoln arrived in New York, last week, from France. Her form is said to be heavier, and her hair has grown nearly white.... The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held in Boston last week. Miss Frances E. Willard presided, and claimed this year as the most encouraging the world has ever seen in the progress of temperance reform.

The following statements, furnished by the Census Office at Washington, exhibit the results of the first count of the population of the State of Rhode Island and the District of Columbia: Rhode Island—Total population, 276,530; males, 133,034; females, 143,496; native, 202,600; foreign, 73,930; white, 269,-533; colored, including 67 Indians and 27 Chinese, 6,597. District of Columbia—Total population, 177,638; males, 83,594; females, 94,044; native, 160,523; foreign, 17,115; white, 118,236; colored, including 13 Chinese, 5 Japanese and 6 Indians, 59,402.

Dr. Edward Seguin, the celebrated French physician, noted for his treatment of nervous diseases and his prominence in the great work of the education of imbeciles, has just died in New York at the age of 69 years.... On account of the great increase in transatlantic trade, several of the transatlantic steamship companies are adding to the number of their vessels, and two new companies have been already projected....The revenue cutter Wolcott, stationed on the Pacific coast, has seized the English sloop Alert for cruising in American waters without papers.

FOREIGN.

Warschafsky, purveyor to the Russian army, now in arrest, is shown to have perpetrated frauds to the amount of 22,000,000 roubles. Born, chief administrator during the late war, has been apprehended at Odessa.... Elsa Linhardt, a German authoress of some note, committed suicide at Civita Vecchia, Italy, by throwing herself into the sea.

A cable dispatch says the English authorities have completed arrangements for prosecuting the members of the Land League, and that frequent meetings of the leading agitators are being held to discuss the situation. Mr. Parnell, M. P., it is said, will be among those indicted. The indictment will be the longest document of the kind in history.—The tenants of King Harman and other landlords, of Sligo, are threatened with death if they pay rent.—A British soldier has been arrested in County Mayo while drilling the Irish peasantry....Lady Fitzwilliam, of London, has been made the victim of a heavy diamond robbery, some of the brilliants having a history traceable to the days of William IV....A cable dispatch reports the matrimonial engagement of Miss Kellogg, the celebrated American prima donna, to a French Marquis....A cable dispatch from London announces the death, in that city, of Harry Beckett, the comedian.... Russia has provisioned for six months the fortified posts on the Turcoman steppes and concluded other arrangements for the advance of 9,000 men on Central Asia....The St. Petersburg Golos says that Russia, which usually exports 320,000,000 bushels of grain, will have to import some this year in consequence of the very general failure of the Russian crop. The prospects for future good harvests, moreover, are not encouraging....Peru has accepted the mediation proffered by Minister Christiancy, and named its Commissioners....The postoffice at Manchester, England, has been burned.

Open revolt prevails in Natal, and the gravest apprehensions are entertained for Gen. Clark and his command. The origin of the trouble was the decision by the Cape Government that only white men shall carry firearms....A Prussian newspaper editor has been sentenced to a fine of 500 marks or fifty days' imprisonment for having published an article libeling and insulting Prince Bismarck and tending to render that statesman contemptible.... Mr. Parnell and his brethren of the Land League are said to have decided to abandon the policy of exhorting the people to preserve the peace, and hereafter to let them take their own course, which is pretty sure to lead to trouble.

Justin McCarthy, the distinguished author, journalist and member of Parliament, has joined the Irish Land League as a protest against the Government prosecutions....A startling report comes from Afghanistan that Abdurrahman Khan, the Ameer whom the English placed upon the throne of Cabul about the time that Gen. Roberts left that city for the relief of Candahar, has been murdered by the revolutionists, and that the city is in a state of anarchy....Bismarck has sent a commission to Alsace to study the condition of the workmen there.

Two eminent French painters have passed away—Muril Guillemin and Frederic Schopin....There seems to be no doubt that the country round Cabul is in a disturbed state. All communication between that district and British India has been cut off.

There is great excitement in England and Ireland over the impending prosecutions against the Land League. A Dublin dispatch says that between Templemore and Thurles signal flashes on the most-approved military system are carried on nightly, and answered by flashes from various points on the hills. There appears to be quite a system of communication by such signals and flashes which is generally considered ominous of mischief. At a meeting of the Dublin Diocesan Synod a resolution was passed urging the Government to take measures to protect their Protestant countrymen. The Home-Rule Confederation of Great Britain and representatives of radical clubs in London have passed resolutions condemning the prosecution of Irish agitators.

Three thousand miles of Persian territory are overrun by warlike Kurds, who are engaged in an indiscriminate slaughter of the inhabitants....The British islands have been visited by a storm of unprecedented severity. In the interior many villages and railroad tracks were flooded, and on the coast the disasters to shipping were numerous. Twenty-eight vessels are known to have been wrecked, and thirty-one lives lost....A messenger sent by Riza Pasha with a proclamation to the inhabitants of Dulcigno, in reference to the cession of that place, has been murdered....Seven persons were killed by a railroad collision at Herstal, Belgium. Many others were injured.

Sensible Advice.

A distinguished writer, speaking of the duties which parents owe their children, says: "A mother makes a great mistake when she does not constantly court the confidence of her daughter. The daughter should share all her secrets with her mother. Many of a home has been blighted, and shame has come to many a household because the mother was too busy or too careless to keep herself in constant sympathy with her daughters. The same is true of the father and son. The young man who spends his evenings from home, and feels that it would be robbing him of his manly independence if he should tell where he goes, is banking against every interest in the future. Fathers and mothers should never allow themselves to grow so old that they are not interested in all that interests their children and their young people. Home comforts, and home amusements, and the best society of young people should be sought with more care than choice investments in stock and bonds; for one pays dividends only for a few years, the other will go on compounding its interests long after you are gone. Young people crave recreation and amusement, and will generally have it; how much better that it should be enjoyed in the homes of the land, and directed by loving hands. Your wild boys and thoughtless girls are mainly recruited from homes where enjoyment is not to be found.

"The parent who sees the boys and girls of the household full of fun and frolic should not grow anxious that he does not see more tears and solemn faces. These come soon enough amid the anxieties and perplexities of life. Make home the happiest place in all the world—so that your sons and daughters as they go out into the great world to buffet with its trials and temptations, will in every quiet moment hear the echo of its loving words and remember its tender admonitions, and thus be strong to conquer in every honorable pursuit."

Several undergraduates of the German University of Marburg have been sentenced to three months' imprisonment in a fortress for dueling.

Don't pick up a child for a fool. He will ask you some questions that the condensed wisdom of the world can not answer.

Physical Forces Which Produced the Present Shape.

The "Comptes Rendus" of the French Academy contains a remarkable paper by M. Faye on the physical forces which have produced the present figure of the earth. After remarking on the use of the pendulum in determining the figure of the earth from a series of measurements of the intensity and direction of the gravitation force at different parts of the earth's surface, he draws attention to the very curious fact that while the direction and intensity of gravity are affected perceptibly by the presence of hills such as Schichallion and Arthur's Seat, or even by masses as small as the great pyramid of the Gizeh, gigantic mountains such as the Himalayas, and great elevated plateaus and table lands, do not affect the pendulum indications in any sensible manner, except in certain cases where, upon elevated continents, there appears to be a veritable defeat of attraction instead of the excess which might be expected. Indeed, the observations are sufficiently striking to seem to point to the supposition that under the whole of every large continent there are enormous cavities. More than this, the attractions at the surface of all the great oceans appear too great to agree with the distribution presumed by Clairaut's formula, which is exact enough for most purposes.

Sir G. Airy's suggestion that the base of the Himalaya range reaches down into the denser liquid interior, and there displaces a certain amount of that liquid, so that the exterior attraction is thereby lessened, is one which, inherently improbable, fails to have any application in explaining why the attraction above the seas should be greater than over the continents. M. Faye propounds the following solution to the difficulty: Under the oceans the globe cools more rapidly and to a greater depth than beneath the surface of the continents. At a depth of 4,000 meters (13,000 feet) the ocean will still have a temperature not remote from 0 deg. C., while at a similar depth beneath the earth's crust the temperature would be not far from 150 deg. C. (allowing 108 feet in depth down for an increase of 1 deg. in the internal temperature). If the earth had but one uniform rate of cooling all over it, it would be reasonable to assume that the solidified crust would have the same thickness and the same average density all over it. It is therefore argued that below the primitive oceans the earth's crust assumed a definite solid thickness before the continents, and that, in contracting, these thicker portions exercised a pressure upon the fluid nucleus tending to elevate still further the continents. The hypothesis, M. Faye thinks, will, moreover, explain the unequal distribution of land and sea around the two poles, the general rise and fall of continents being determined by the excess of density of the crust below the oceans, and by the lines or points of least resistance to internal pressure being at the middle of continents or at the margins of oceans.

Pecuniary Independence.

We talk a great deal about our political, intellectual, moral and social independence; all the world has heard us talk about them. We do not enjoy them as fully, perhaps, as we think. How much independence of thought has the journalist, for instance, who must bid for an audience, the author whose first thought must be never to displease a reader, the orator who must repeat the stock notions of his hearers, the professor who has to reconcile evolution with theology; how much liberty of action has the voter who depends upon a Government salary, or who is in a politician's employ? One cannot very seriously blame these people, to whom independence often means starvation. What I want to set in clear light is this: that independence in life and thought depends, more than we like to believe, upon pecuniary independence; it is not to be had by wishing merely. Individuals there are, and always will be, who will suffer for their moral or intellectual independence; but the communities will be what circumstances make them. This, again, I want to set in clear light: that we are, as a community, deficient, in spite of all our national wealth, and unnecessarily deficient, in the best part of independence—the power to enjoy our lives. In this respect we are behind our friends in France, with their 2,000,000 of people living upon their incomes.

These 2,000,000 of people are not, for the most part, either idle, or frivolous, or wealthy people. Many of them live in the cities, but more of them are quiet people, living on their modest properties in the country, and enjoying their competence in a rational way—enjoying friendships, social pleasures, family affections, and all the kindly observances of home life in a way that we have little idea of—in a way that the tourist in Paris sees nothing of. We have much to learn from the French, and among the things that we have to learn are some that may surprise us. One of these things is the comfort, the unity, and the permanence of French homes. The French home and family, their happiness, their unity, their permanence, these have been developed by the combined industry, thrift, and domestic sentiment of the most intelligent people in Europe, and especially by its great middle class. We have the significant testimony of Prince Bismarck "that the French nation has a social solidity such as no other nation of Europe enjoys." And Mr. Matthew Arnold, from whose "Mixed Essays" I quote, adds: "This can only come from the broad basis of well-being, and of cause for satisfaction with life, which in France, more than in other countries, exists." If we had 2,000,000 of people, or 1,000,000, who were enjoying a competence, earned or inherited, can it be doubted that we should be a happier people, and a better one, than we are? France and the United States have this important feature in common—in each country nearly one-half of the people live directly by agriculture; but our country homes and families have not attained the comfort or the permanence of theirs.—T. M. Coan, in Harper's Magazine.

A Remarkable Woman.

Miss Milly Gibson, who died in the poorhouse in Laurens county, Ga., was a remarkable woman. There was an account published a year ago of the opening of the longitudinal and transverse sutures of her skull, thus laying bare her naked brain, and rendering it necessary to keep her head bound with a handkerchief. She was 84 years of age, for fifty years of her life an opium-eater, an inveterate smoker for seventy-three years, and a member of the Methodist Church for seventy years. She was in the poorhouse for four years.

The Robber of a Hornets' Nest.

The following story of how shrewdness and penetration saved a man's property is told by Mrs. T. D. Brown:

A pea-seller, to whom nature had given no grace of person, nor bestowed any mental endowments, made up for the deficiencies by a large share of physical strength and energy.

His wife acquired his shrewdness and penetration.

Though their trade was humble and yielded but a small profit, the pea-seller had, by skill and economy, saved a small amount.

Investing it in some other speculations, and more especially in loans of money, he became in time, noted as a small capitalist in the place where he was conducting business.

He had a comfortable house to live in, a well from which to draw water for culinary purposes and near the well stood a large tamarind tree, on a branch of which some hornets had made a large hive.

One night a thief got into the house, and whilst trying to open a latch of the door, was observed by the pea-seller and his wife, who were awake at the time and guessed that some one had entered their dwelling.

It was sufficiently audible to her husband and the robber, asking where the money-box was concealed; the husband replied that the box was fastened to a branch of the tamarind tree near the well.

The robber, obtaining, by chance, this information which he was so desirous of learning, abandoned the thought of getting into the house.

He went under the tamarind tree, and looking up, discovered, by the reflection of the moonbeams, that something like a box was hanging to one of the branches.

He climbed the tree with agility, and just as he had put out his hand and seized the hive, the hornets, who were disturbed in their night's repose, flew in numbers to resist the wanton attack.

They alighted on his face, hands and back, inflicting a hundred wounds at once, against the torture of which, the robber, who could not stand, let go his hold of the tree and fell with a loud splash into the well beneath, smarting.

The next morning the robber was taken and consigned to the stocks.

A Church Invaded by Bats.

For many months the parish church of Thirsk, which has been recently restored, has been infested in its interior by several scores of bats, which not only made fearful work of the new oak stalling, but at evening service might be seen flitting to and fro in the vicinity of the rafters of the nave. Various means have been tried to rid the edifice of the pests, but with little success until this week, when an owl was placed in the church. During the last few nights the officers have paid visits to St. Mary's for the purpose of ascertaining what effect the new inhabitant had on the bats, but, although they have waited each evening well into the darkning, not a bat has been seen. If the owl has not destroyed them, he has had the effect of compelling them to keep in very close quarters. A few months ago the bats did damage to the pipes of the new organ. They entered at the wide end, and the pipes being narrow at the bottom, found themselves unable to get back. As many as eight dead bats were found in a single pipe.—St. James' Gazette, London.

The language of inscriptions on ancient Irish monuments is, contrary to the custom of other countries at the same date, Irish, and Irish can claim to be one of the oldest written languages extant in Europe. It is still spoken by several thousand persons, but their number decreases every year.

A man 65 years old has been found in Harrington, Me., who has been out of the State only once, has been on a steamboat only once, and never was in a city until he visited Portland, which he "reckoned wasn't much of a place for farms."

Vegetine.

More to Me than Gold.

WALPOLE, Mass., March 7, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:
I wish to inform you what VEGETINE has done for me. I have been troubled with Erysipelas Humor for more than thirty years, in my limbs and other parts of my body, and have been a great sufferer. I commenced taking VEGETINE one year ago last August, and can truly say it has done more for me than any other medicine. I seem to be perfectly free from this humor and can recommend it to every one. Would not be without this medicine—'tis more to me than gold—and I feel it will prove a blessing to others as it has to me.
Yours, most respectfully,
MRS. DAVID CLARK.

J. BENTLEY, M. D., says:

It has done more good than all Medical Treatment.

NEWMARKET, Ont., Feb. 9, 1880.

MR. H. R. STEVENS, Boston, Mass.:
Sir—I have sold during the past year a considerable quantity of your VEGETINE, and I believe in all cases it has given satisfaction. In one case, a delicate young lady of about seventeen years was much benefited by its use. Her parents informed me that it had done her more good than all the medical treatment to which she had previously been subjected.
Yours respectfully,
J. BENTLEY, M. D.

Loudly in Its Praise.

TORONTO, Ont., March 3, 1880.
Dear Sir—Considering the short time that VEGETINE has been before the public here, it sells well as a blood purifier, and for troubles arising from a sluggish or torpid liver it is a first-class medicine. Our customers speak loudly in its praise.

SIR HENRY BESSEMER has taken out no less than 114 patents. The freedom of the city of London has just been conferred upon him. Before his steel process was introduced into Sheffield the entire make of steel was 51,000 tons a year; now it is 830,000 tons.

A NEW steamship has just been launched in England, and it is said to be, with the exception of the Great Eastern, the largest ever built. The new steamer is named the Furnissia, and will be added to the Anchor Line, and used in transatlantic trade.

SIR FITZROY KELLY, late Chief Baron of England, enjoyed for fifteen years a professional income of $125,000. Sir Roundell Palmer reached the unprecedented figure of $150,000. The topmost point ever attained by an English physician was Sir Benjamin Brodie's income of $65,000.

GEN. KARGE, of Princeton College, who has filled the chair of continental languages and literature in that institution since 1870, has been tendered a similar professorship in the Western Reserve University, which is soon to be removed to Cleveland, Ohio, from Hudson.

IN America and in all the English-speaking countries of the world, except England herself, there is no impediment to the marriage of a man with the sister his deceased wife. In the Australian, Canadian and South African colonies of England laws have been passed legalizing such marriages, and these laws have received the royal approval.

THE Macon (Ga.) Messenger tells a wonderful story of how a mule killed a negro. The man was riding a mule to the town of Gordon. Just as the town was reached the hind legs of the mule, without any provocation whatever, were seen to fly into the air, the negro shot upward about ten feet, and, falling upon his side on the earth, his body burst completely open. He died within ten minutes after the fall.

THE extent of the Government signal service is indicated by the official report of the bureau. This shows the bureau receives 1,338 reports daily from the various stations extending to every part of the United States. While meteorology cannot yet be properly styled a science, it is significant of the rapid progress made toward discovery of its laws that out of 2,835 predictions of storms by the signal service, 83.4 per cent. have been verified.

THE export of breadstuffs from the United States for September, as reported by the Bureau of Statistics, in our Washington dispatches, amounted in value to $23,881,936, being about $12,000,000 less than for the corresponding period in the year preceding. But the export of breadstuffs for the past nine months aggregated $208,679,549, being over $32,000,000 more than for the corresponding month of last year. The figures for the last months show to what extent the export was checked by the weakness of the foreign market.

LOVE laughs at locksmiths, and so do those who are bound to attend a circus. The operatives of a silk-mill in Paterson, N. J., asked permission to go to the tented field. The proprietors of the mill said the manufacture of silk must go on, and to make assurance doubly sure they locked the factory doors with the operatives inside. After demanding to be liberated several times, one of the employes took a screw-driver and took off the lock. The crowd rushed out, yelling like school-boys at regaining their liberty. They went to the circus.

SIR G. W. DES VŒUX, Governor of the Fiji islands, talked with a Chicago Times reporter while on his way across our continent. Des Vœux is an Englishman, but for years has been one of the 2,000 whites who live among the 150,000 natives on the eighty islands forming the Fiji group. He said that until three years ago the mountain region of Ovalau was occupied by ferocious cannibals, numbering about 10,000, and given beyond question to man eating in their festival ceremonies. These savages are now under effectual subjugation. The Governor predicts prosperity for enlightened Fijians.

A NEW YORK firm has been making a baby's outfit worth $3,000. The cradle is of willow, with draperies of Valenciennes lace, and a lining of quilted satin ribbon. The every-day sheets have plain centers, and borders of tucks and French embroidery; those for days when the baby is on exhibition are of lawn, with Valenciennes insertion. There are three dozen dresses in the wardrobe, numberless little sacks, and a cloak of white embossed silk, trimmed with pearl embroidery on Brussels net; another is of white cashmere, with embroidery and duchess lace for trimming. Poor baby is to be smothered in all this finery, when it would be healthier and happier in a cotton slip, with a comfortable to roll and tumble on. It seems to take more money to launch this baby into the fashionable world than is spent on most brides' trousseaus when they are launched into matrimony.

SOME of our railway magnates are "dropping" immense sums in Europe in the purchase of pictures and statuary. Mr. Vanderbilt gave some $100,000 for a painting by Messonier; the late A. T. Stewart paid $50,000 for one by the same artist, which is sharply criticised by the connoisseurs. And now Mr. Albert Spencer, of New York, on his recent trip to Europe, purchased twenty-six paintings, which cost him $110,000. He has also ordered of Gerome "The Snake Charmer," for which he is to pay $15,000. Among his purchases are said to eight Diazes, two or three Corots, a Troyan and a Messonier.

CAPITAL for investment in national, colonial, or municipal loans appears to be in extraordinary supply in England. To illustrate, as showing the readiness with which the moneyed classes in that country subscribe for colonial loans, and the confidence investors, as a body, have in the prospects and position of British dependencies, it turns out that the tenders for the new Victorian (Australasian) loan of $10,000,000, which has just been offered, amounted in all to no less than $55,000,000, or five and one-half times the requisite sum. This shows that there is yet an over-abundance of money to loan in Great Britain.

PROF. WATSON, of the Washburn Observatory, in the grounds of the Wisconsin State University, at Madison, Wis., is building an observatory of a novel kind. It is generally known that from the bottom of a deep well the stars can be very well seen at bright noonday. Upon this principle Prof. Watson is conducting his experiment. A cellar twenty feet in depth has been sunk below the surface of the ground at the bottom of the slope; over this a fine stone building is erected. At the top of the hill, which is sixty feet above the bottom of the cellar, powerful reflectors are to be placed to throw rays of light down a tube which ends in the cellar, where the observer will be stationed.

THE Oneida Community, which, for sixty years, has tainted the morals of Central New York, is on the eve of dissolution, and will fall off our civilization like an excrescence that has had its growth. It found its origin in licentiousness, and for a time flourished in violence of law; but nature has done what the courts could not do. Decay commenced with the second generation, which could not identify its parentage, and "the community" has become so small that the leading members have abandoned the communistic doctrines, and, for mercenary reasons, organized a joint-stock company, with a capital of $600,000, divided into shares of $100 each. The most capable will secure the largest profits, and the weaker ones will be "frozen out." This step will of necessity be followed by jealousies that must destroy the free-love system, and in a few years it is to be hoped that the blot will be entirely erased.

A lately-landed Hibernian was a prisoner recently in the Fordham (N. Y.) Police Court to answer a charge of assault and battery preferred against him by a neighbor.

"Why did you strike the complainant?" asked Justice Wheeler.

"Bekase he tould me ter du it," was the reply.

"Oh, you merely obeyed orders?"

"Yis, Judge."

"Tell me all about it."

"All there ees about it, Judge, ees we had a little growl, and oi tould him oi'd slap ees face; then ee jumps oop and down and cries three toimes, 'Du it, du it, du it.'"

"And you did it?"

"Oi did, sur."

"Fine, $10."

"What, after he tould me ter du it?"

"Yes; you had no business to strike him, even at his own request. Got $10?"

A friend paid the fine, and the prisoner retired, muttering to himself, "A strange countree oi've got into."

A Sailor's Luck.

The captain of a fishing schooner, whose adventures are recounted by the Bangor Whig, believes that there is such a thing as luck in human affairs. He has fished on the Georges seventeen years, and last spring concluded he would go home to Gloucester, sell his little home, pay off the mortgage, and with the proceeds go to Boothbay and live quietly. He got as far as Portland, and had a dory stolen from his vessel. Arrived at Gloucester, he accidentally lost his right finger. He lifted the mortgage by selling his house, and had $233.50 left. The money he put in an envelope, and the envelope in an inside breastpocket. He set sail for Boothbay with his family in his vessel, and on Saturday last, when off Cape Elizabeth, leaned over the side of the vessel to pull in a rope. As he bent forward the envelope fell from his pocket, and as $1.50 of the money was silver, it sank before his eyes.

THE enormous apple crop in New England has been squeezed into so much cider that the price has dropped to 90 cents a barrel. It is said that drunkenness is in consequence far more common than usual. A Justice of Westfield, Mass., whenever a cider drunkard is brought before him, lets the prisoner off on condition that he will go home immediately and knock the heads out of the cider barrels.

FARM NOTES.

THE United States, while it contains less than a sixth of the population of Europe, has four-fifths as many swine, a third as many cattle, and a fifth as many sheep as are in all the European countries together.

PERHAPS the heaviest returns ever obtained in this country from a single sheep was secured last year by Daniel Smith, of Hinsdale, N. H., who raised from a Shropshire ewe three lambs, which he sold for $18, and the wool of the ewe for $1.50, making the total income from the sheep $19.50.

FRIEND farmers, prepare your land for wheat better than you ever prepared it before. Harrow, harrow, harrow. If the soil is sandy, roll after sowing or drilling in. If at all inclined to be clayey, roll before sowing. See if the results of this careful preparation do not more than pay the cost.

PROF. BUDD says, in the Iowa College Quarterly, of the Worden grape: "We have the true Worden growing on the college farm, and the merest novice can distinguish between it and the Concord at a distance of ten feet. It ripens in Iowa fully ten days before the latter, and the fruit is larger and more juicy."

CHICKEN CHOLERA.—Seeing considerable about this disease in the different agricultural journals, I give you a very simple cure, which was communicated to me by a lady friend. We have tried it and found it to work "to a charm." It is simply a piece of salt bacon or shoulder nailed to a stump or board and placed where the fowls can pick at it. Old wormy stuff—that is not good to eat—is just as good as any, and a large piece can be bought at almost any country store for a mere song. Try it.—Hayseed, in the Son of the Soil.

THE COMING FENCE.—The Farm Journal gives in a few words its opinions concerning the fences of a no distant future. It says: "1st, the fencing material of the era now dawning will consist more largely of iron than heretofore, but, 2d, iron posts will not be used unless there is a great fall in the price of iron, a circumstance not likely to occur. 3d, to turn cattle and horses only, a fence consisting of wooden posts with three iron No. 6 wires will prove the cheapest and best fence. The bottom wire, about two feet from the ground, may have barbs upon it, to prevent cattle from pushing against it; the top wire should have plastering lath wired to it horizontally, the lath whitewashed, to prevent animals running into the fence. 4th, to turn sheep and hogs wooden fence is cheapest and best. 5th, as to the fence of the more distant future for turning cattle, we are not prepared to name it, but many farmers in the old dairy sections will say 'fence, no fence.' The soiling system that will feed and support one hundred cows on one hundred acres requires no fence at all, for the cows do not graze, but are fed at the barn winter and summer."

SALT FOR POULTRY.—Hens often have a habit of biting and pulling their feathers and greedily eating them until their bodies are bare. This practice, it is believed, is occasioned by a want of salt, as when salted food is given them they make no attempt to continue the habit. Salt pork chopped fine and fed twice a week has been adopted with success, while others put a teaspoonful of salt with two quarts of meal or shorts moistend, well mixed, and fed about twice every week. Fowls, like human beings, to be healthy must have a certain allowance of salt. So long as the American people prize sugar sweet cakes, and the New York hotels consume 1,800,000 chickens and poultry, and 5,500,000 of eggs every week, the poultry business in this country will remain a good one. Give your fowls warm, clean houses and dry, grassy runs, if you would have them clear of roup and canker. And feed them regularly with good nourishing food, if you would have them free from disease, lay more eggs, and be more profitable every day.

WINTER DAIRYING.—The better class of livers in the United States are beginning to demand good, fresh butter instead of the salted article which has hitherto been eaten through the winter months. In consequence those farmers who try to please the palate by producing a sweet, nutty-tasting commodity, will reap their reward by receiving a remunerating price. Setting aside fancy prices, it is certain that a good, fair rate will always be paid for butter which can be depended upon to come to hand weekly in uniform quality. The best butter-maker in the United States fails unless the cows are fed properly, therefore there must be the right sort of food. The hay should be made from grass cut when in bloom, and this alone will do, but some corn meal and wheat bran will increase the cream and add to the rich flavor of the butter. Also the use of carrots will cause a greater flow of milk, and there will be then the peculiarly fresh taste which characterizes butter when cows are in good pasture in June. Of course comfortable stabling, cleanliness, and exercise in a sheltered yard will be requisite for full success. The cows should have their calves in September or thereabouts, and the heifer calves from all good milkers should be raised, which can be done on the skimmed milk. In the autumn there is no forage or food of any kind, better for milch cows as a help to failing pasture than pumpkins. I have used them freely for years with the best results, and find the fear of the seeds all nonsense. At the present time I have a fine lot growing among the corn and about three acres planted near the barn, which together will be sufficient to last till Christmas if I can secure a portion of them from frost. After the pumpkins are gone, carrots are better than any other variety of roots, and if fed till grass comes again there need be no loss of quality in the butter. The quantity of the milk will be equal to the best grass season, and will depend upon the cows. Any man having common sense, and managing properly, can obtain double the average given by cows of the kind usually met with, if he will buy good ones and breed from none but deep milkers, and from bulls which are from a deep milking strain.—Correspondence of Country Gentleman.

To Remove Wrinkles.

To one fluid ounce of tincture of gum benzoin add seven fluid ounces distilled rose-water and one-half ounce glycerine. Bathe, face, neck and hands with it at night, letting it dry on. Wash off in the morning with a very little pure white castile soap and soft water. If the water is hard, add a little dissolved borax. This is a famous cosmetic, and has been sold under various names. It is an excellent remedy for tan, sunburn and freckles, also. The latter, it is said, may be removed by using the following decoction: Put a quantity of elder flowers into a jug, pour boiling water on them, let the mixture stand twenty-four hours and strain through muslin. Wash the face every morning with the decoction. It is good also for sunburn and to beautify the skin.

HOUSEKEEPERS' HELPS.

FRECKLE LOTION.—Muriate ammonia, one dram; cologne water, two drams; distilled water, seven ounces; mix and use as a wash. It contains nothing injurious.

ROAST OYSTERS.—Open, leave the oysters upon the lower shells, place in a large dripping-pan and set in the upper grate in a quick oven for ten minutes. Take out, season with butter, pepper and salt, and serve upon the shell.

BROILED OYSTERS.—Select large ones, wipe dry and broil upon a fine wire gridiron. By dredging with flour before broiling, a crust is formed which is liked by many. Sprinkle with salt and pepper and drop a bit of butter upon each.

PIE CRUST.—Three and a half cupfuls of sifted flour; one cupful sweet lard, one teaspoonful salt, one teaspoonful baking-powder, one cupful very cold water; mix with knife, using hands as little as possible to mix with; roll.

CORN FRITTERS.—To the beaten yolks of three eggs add a teacup of milk, a pint of boiled green corn grated, a little salt and as much flower as will form a batter thick enough to drop from a spoon. Beat the whole very hard, then stir in the beaten whites of the egg; drop the batter a spoonful at a time, in hot lard.

CROW'S NEST.—Fill a deep pudding tin, or dish with apples cut in thin slices; sugar and cinnamon, or lemon, to sweeten and flavor to taste, and a little water; covered with a thick crust made as above; bake until apples are tender; serve hot with hard sauce, or with cream and sugar; be sure to cut air holes in the crust to let the steam escape.

OYSTER SOUP.—One quart of solid oysters, free from grit. Pour into a sauce-pan two quarts of boiling water; cream, a large tablespoonful of flour with a half teacupful of butter, thicken the boiling water with the paste, season with pepper, boil up, add the oysters and cook until the edges curl. Have heated a teacupful of sweet cream or as rich milk as you can get, turn into the tureen, pour in the oysters and serve.

FAVRE BEANS.—Boil some white beans until quite dry and tender. Into a four quart baking dish put an inch layer of the beans, seasoned with pepper and salt, strew over minced bits of salt pork, cover with a layer of raw oysters, sprinkle with powdered cracker crumbs and bits of butter and cover with another layer of beans, thus alternating until the dish is almost full. The beans should make the last layer. Pour over a pint, or more, if the beans were very dry, of oyster liquor, cover and bake half an hour, removing the cover toward the last that the top may brown.

CHUTNEY.—One pound salt, one pound mustard-seed, one pound stoned raisins, one pound brown sugar, twelve ounces garlic, six ounces cayenne pepper, two quarts unripe gooseberries, two quarts best vinegar; the mustard-seed gently dried and bruised; sugar made into syrup with pint of vinegar; gooseberries dried, and boiled in a quart of the vinegar; the garlic to be well bruised in a mortar; when cold, gradually mix the whole in a large mortar, and with the remaining vinegar thoroughly amalgamate them. To be tied down close; the longer kept the better.

Telegraphic Blunders.

A gentleman who had gone to the country to find a summer location for his family telegraphed to his wife. "Home to-night," and so the wife posted into the country at once, while the husband was making his way in a contrary direction.

Not long since a message came to the principal of a business house in this city from his traveling agent, who had reached Philadelphia—"Am at Continental Hotel. Send some hash by mail." The agent did not intend to reflect on the food at the hotel, but wanted "cash" sent by mail.

An affectionate uncle was informed by telegraph. "Mary is to be buried on Wednesday. Come sure." Mary, who lived in Chicago, was his favorite niece, and, as he had not heard of her illness, the sad intelligence gave him a severe shock. He dressed himself in deep mourning, and made a hurried journey to the west to find a jovial party assembled at Mary's wedding. The wires had arranged for her to be "buried" instead of "married."

Probably the worst blunder ever made was one that occurred in the case of a St. Louis merchant, who, while in New York, received a telegram informing him that his wife was ill. He sent a message to his family doctor, asking the nature of the sickness and if there was any danger, and received promptly the answer: "No danger. Your wife had a child. If we can keep her from having another to-night she will do well." The mystification of the agitated husband was not removed until a second inquiry revealed the fact that his indisposed lady had had a "chill."—From the Hour.

Is Presbyterianism Declining?

The totals of the yearly additions from April, 1875, to April, 1880, are given in the minutes thus:

1875-76	46,240
1876-77	45,088
1877-78	32,277
1878-79	29,196
1879-80	26,828
Grand total	179,619

Deduct from this sum the difference between the total church membership in April, 1875—506,034—and the total in April, 1880—578,671—or 72,637, and we have left a total of 106,982 persons to be accounted for. From this last total deduct for deaths in the average ratio of 20 per 1,000, or for the five years 56,276, and we have a remainder, 50,706—a sum representing the number of church members who have disappeared from our rolls in ways unaccounted for during five years.—The Rev. Wm. H. Roberts, in the Observer.

INDIANA NEWS.

OLD man Shivers, attempting to cross the track in front of a train, at Sullivan, was killed, the other day.

OVER 100 persons took out naturalization papers in the Clerk's office, at Fort Wayne, on the day before election.

RICHARD LAYTON, at Madison, had the ball of one of his eyes burst by a nail he was driving flying from under the hammer and striking his eye.

THERE has been some excitement in Bloomington over a suspicion that one John Hendricks, found dead in a barn, was really drugged to death to prevent his voting.

JOSEPH W. WILSON, while about to take the train at Perryville, the other day, for his home in Crawfordsville, was run over and killed.

THE steam flouring-mill of George B. Brown, at Cortland, Jackson county, was burned the other night, doubtless by incendiary fire. Loss, $10,000; insurance, $2,500.

JAMES GLEASON, arrested at New Lebanon the other night for cruelly beating his wife, while en route to jail, attempted to escape, stopping the officer and firing a revolver at him. Gleason was arrested last year for stealing wheat, and is an old offender against the law.

A TRAGEDY was lately enacted near Independence. William Pinkerman and Roscoe Rohrer became involved in a quarrel regarding the possession of some property, when Rohrer shot Pinkerman in the abdomen. The wounded man cannot live. Rohrer tried to escape, but was captured three miles distant.

AUBURN, IND., NOVEMBER 4, 1880.

THE DEMOCRATS OF DeKALB

Make a Gallant Fight, and Increase their Majority Nearly 100 Over Landers.

Waterloo and Auburn did Nobly

The republicans have to go abroad for solace in the election returns, as DeKalb has not shown up very favorably for them. Hancock gains about seventy-five over Landers, notwithstanding the greenbackers in the north part of the county voted for Garfield. It was a splendid effort on the part of the democracy, and shows what the boys can do when they take a notion. We have little interest in the result outside. We fought for a principle here, that no credit-mobilier or bribe-taker should, with the consent of this people, occupy the presidential chair, and they sustained it. If other localities did not follow us, we can't help it. We can lay the flattering unction to our soul that we did our duty.

The Election.

The news that has flashed over the wires in regard to the late political contest of the American people against office-holders, is of such a nature as to create the suspicion that the grand old democratic party has been swept under, and the devil and the republican party have triumphed, and will rule this people for another long four years. Are we drifting to an empire, and is this the last of free government? God save our country! The indications are that the republicans have not only gotten the presidency, but a majority in congress also. This means four years more of whisky-ring steals. Four years longer must the people, born to love liberty and honest government, submit to be pillaged and plundered by a minority party, the most corrupt and rotten that ever disgraced any age or country. Four years more of domination by the cormorants who have about as much regard for constitutional rights and the liberties of this people as the devil of hell has for holiness. But what cannot be cured must be endured, and we should accept the result in a cheerful spirit.

Many causes are being assigned for this defeat. It seems plain to us that the chief causes to which the result is attributable are two: the tremendous power of the army of office-holders who used all the machinery of government to the fullest extent, and the false misrepresentations of the attitude of the south by this sectional-hate-party. From the opening of the campaign till its close, the bloody-shirt was flaunted before the people of the north; appeals have constantly been made to the passions of the people of this section, and all the bad blood stirred up against the people of the south. They have been held up to the country as traitors, murderers, robbers and haters of northern people. They have been accused of hoisting the confederate flag, killing republican negroes, and running northern people out of the south. The south tried to rebel against this government, but was whipped, and driven back into the Union. Her people accepted the results of the war, and to-day there is no spirit of secession in that country. The people of the south prefer union to disunion, and are as loyal to this government as the people of the north. The south is not solid against the constitution, against the country. It is solid against the republican party, and why? It was the worst element of that party that with their worldly possessions in carpet-sacks, flocked to the south like buzzards to a battle-field, rode the negro into office and literally stole the state governments out, and spread ruin more direful than the consequences of the war itself. Such a high-handed robbery was never known before in any country. Millions of bonds were saddled upon that people, for which they never received a foot of railroad or a dollar's worth of benefit, and under the burdens of which debts the people of many sections of that country are groaning to-day. When the governments were remanded to the people, these thieves, who came there poor, like buzzards when the carrion is devoured, having no further interest, left with millions in their pockets, and either came back north or went west. The republican party continues to slander and persecute the south, and the south will continue to be solid against the republican party. It would deserve little respect if it were not so.

THE statute of Jeanne d'Arc, recently unveiled at Compiegne, the town where she was taken prisoner by the English, is equestrian, and represents Jeanne holding a standard in one hand and pointing to the enemy with the other. The sculptor is M. Leroux. The government cast the work in broze and presented it to the town of Compiegne, which has had it erected in front of the belfry, almost on the spot where Jeanne was taken prisoner by the Picardy archer who was in the service of the English.

The Latest.

The news passing over the wires to-day has been more favorable to the democrats. Both parties are claiming New York, and a telegram was received about noon claiming that state for the democrats by 8,000, but we cannot vouch for it. Oregon is expected to go democratic. The Indianapolis Sentinel has the following editorial to-day on the situation: "As we put our first edition to press this morning at 2 o'clock we have but little from New York beyond the estimate of a republican paper of New York City, which claims the state for Garfield. On the other hand we have undoubtedly gained five congressmen, and this would seem to indicate that General Hancock had carried the state.

We have surely carried New Jersey, California, Nevada and the entire south, which casts 156 votes in the electoral college.

If we should be fortunate enough to secure New York, then General Hancock will have 191 votes, or six more than enough. New York is absolutely necessary to his success. Without it he is defeated.

Mr. Barnum's Claims.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3.—Grace, Kelly democrat, is elected mayor of New York by a majority of about 1,500. He has a majority of 1,339, with fifteen polling places yet unheard from officially. Truax, candidate for judge of the supreme court, and all of the county ticket, is elected. Hancock's majority in the city as allowed by the republican bureau of election, is 40,000. There is nothing definite and final about the state yet. The democratic gain in Albany is larger than expected, and the ratio of gains in the interior is about as reported last night. The general estimate this afternoon is that Garfield has about 20,000 majority, but no figures are produced to substantiate this, and the well-known predilection of the republicans in over-estimating figures must be taken into account. The World estimates in the state at about 8,000, but a reduction of all the estimate is hourly going on. The news from other states is astonishingly meager this afternoon. Nothing is published by either side in relation to California, and but very little from New Jersey. It is, however, certain that New Jersey has gone democratic, and you may say with confidence that Garfield's election depends upon the vote of New York, which is not assured. In this city returns are being withheld in the most scandalous manner, especially from the eighth district, which is controled by the notorious John J. O'Brien, the chief of the bureau of election. From a large proportion of this district no returns have yet been published, nor have the poll clerk's lists been sent to the office of the mayor, as required by law, and has been done in other portions of the city. If the republicans were they would not pursue this course in order to insure the presidential majority. The vote as returned from police headquarters will not be the honest vote of New York city. The difference caused by the swindle will probably be the cause of Garfield's election, it he be declared elected. W. H. BARNUM.

GARFIELD'S MAJORITY

SURE OF THE STATE

FORT WAYNE complete, gives a democratic majority of 255 over the October election.

Neighborhood Nippings.

The greenback vote of Noble county was 88. Two years ago it was 899.

Week before last the postoffice in Kendalville was robbed of nine dollars and some postage stamps.

The Lagrange Register announces the death recently of John Brunley, of that county. He was eighty-five years old, and was one of the men who saw this country in its wild and unsettled state, having been one of the early settlers.

A switchman named David Lowry, of the Muncie road, was instantly killed in Fort Wayne, while at work in the yard. By some means he got under the wheels, and received a fatal cut across the breast. He leaves a family in Bloomingdale.

The Albion New Era remarks: The Larwill (Whitley Co.) Blade threatens to die unless the people of that town show a disposition to keep its wheels properly greased. It is useless to attempt to publish a six-column newspaper in a three-column town inhabited by one-column business men.

John Jones and Lew Eyler, of Lagrange, have acknowledged to being the parties who burglarized the shoe-store of David Postenfield, of that place, on the 11th of October. The goods were found secreted in a haystack, and the parties were sent to jail.

Albion New Era: Among the passengers of the ill-fated steamer, Alpena, which went down with all on board in the recent storm on Lake Michigan, was W. S. Benham, editor of the Grand Haven (Mich.) Herald, and lady. Some two years ago Mr. Benham spent a day or two in Albion, with a view of purchasing the New Era office, but finally located at Grand Haven. He was a genial, whole-souled gentleman, and it pains us to hear of his untimely end.

The Fort Wayne Gazette of last week says: Adolph Schreibel, a festive young fellow of this city, has been for some time engaged to Miss Mary Bradtmuller, an estimable young lady residing with her parents at No. 59 Douglas avenue. On last Wednesday their marriage was to have been consummated at the residence of Mary's papa, but for a very good reason the ceremony did not take place. The trousseau, the supper, and even the minister were all on hand. To make the situation still more embarrassing, a large concourse of friends of both parties thronged the parlors. But one thing was lacking, and that was Schreibel himself. After an hour of suspense a messenger arrived on the scene with a note from Schreibel to his intended. It said briefly that he had gone to Europe, and could not marry her. No other explanation of his shocking conduct was given. Of course the bride fainted and her papa raved. Finally the guests were dismissed without entering into any explanation.

Railroad News.

A few days since a reporter of the New York World had an interview with A. L. Hopkins, president of the Wabash, St. Louis & Pacific railroad, in which the reporter asked:

"Have you anything in contemplation east of Chicago?"

"We shall turn our attention to that territory in earnest during the next few months. Lake Shore has finally refused to permit Wabash to cross its tracks, and, although we had a satisfactory arrangement with the managers of the road, Mr. Vanderbuilt has since declined to make any concessions. Our western system has secured for Wabash an independent line from Omaha and Council Bluffs to Chicago as good as the Rock Island line. The leases and roads which the Wabash controls give it a connection from Kansas City to Chicago as short as any other line. The line between St. Louis and Chicago is completed, and it is as short a line as there is. On the 1st of January, 1881, we shall have trains running to Detroit from Butler, Ind. Mr. Vanderbuilt having declined on behalf of the Lake Shore, to accept the Wabash business at Chicago (and we could have turned over a vast amount of freight at that distributing point) we have already closed a lease which gives us control of the Chicago and Western Indiana railroad. This road runs from Chicago to Dalton, and at the latter point it is proposed to build an air-line of 150 miles over a flat country at a small cost, which will connect with the Wabash line about to be completed to Detroit at a point to the north of Toledo. In fact it is contemplated to parallel the Lake Shore in every direction that may be desirable, Mr. Vanderbuilt having refused the Wabash business at Chicago on any terms. Wabash will then have a line from Chicago to Detroit, twenty-five miles shorter than any other route. At Detroit we have a contract with the Great Western of Canada, which is better than a lease or even ownership of the road, by which we will be able to run our cars to Buffalo, where the Wabash will have a separate depot, and will conduct its business as if it owned an independent road of its own."

It is authoritatively announced that in January next the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe road will be completed to a junction with the Southern Pacific.

The state of Michigan has obtained a verdict against the Lake Shore road for $83,481 back taxes.

A Bold Raid.

The hungry and seedy tramps have commenced their depredations in Auburn again. Sometime after twelve o'clock of Wednesday night the tailoring establishment of Henry Gugerli was entered by raising a window in the rear of the building, and two new suits just finished, several parts of suits, and some cloth were taken, amounting in all to a hundred and fifty dollars. There were several of the robbers, but there is no clue as to who they are. Sheriff Leas is endeavoring to work up the case.

—Now that the election is over, the stump speaker will cease to throw dirt and slang.

—The president has designed Thursday, Nov. 25, as a day of national thanksgiving.

—It was two to one against Joe. Ruffner in a racket Tuesday night, but he came out alive.

—Miss Lillie Gorcas, of Hicksville, Ohio, visited our charming Maud Allen Saturday last.

—Dr. J. Spooner, formerly of this city, but now of Peru, is in the city looking well and hearty.

—The Corunna band presents a fine appearance, and makes good music with their new instruments.

—The Neoteric dancing club will organize next week, and will probably give a dance the week following.

—Among others from Fort Wayne Saturday, we noticed our old friends Billy Baldock and Fred. Kimball.

—On the first page of this paper will be found a sermon from Rev. Dr. Talmage on the presidential contest.

—Frank and William Altenburg will leave for Michigan this week after a few week's visit under the parental roof.

—We believe we heard some one hollowing for Garfield Tuesday night, after a telegram was received from New York.

—How is it that our band never plays for the republican rallies, and every other band in the county is hired by them?

—Superintendent W. H. McIntosh, authorizes us to state that there will be a special examination of teachers on the 13th of this month.

—The whole number of votes cast in Auburn precinct in October was 603, and in November 616, being a democratic increase of 16 votes.

—We take this opportunity to notify the band boys that COURIER office is open for them to—make themselves scarce—when they want to practice.

—Mr. M. Koder, of Edgerton, Ohio, was married by Rev. W. O. Butler, to Miss M. E. Crise, at the residence of the bride's parents in Butler, Oct. 31.

—John Roskopf, formerly of this city, has started a barber-shop in Hicksville, Ohio. John is a good workman, and we hope will succeed in his new undertaking.

—Clyde Moore returned from Valparaiso Friday evening last, where he finished his business course, and will probably accept a position in a wholesale house at Chicago.

—An exchange truthfully remarks: "A false friend resembles a shadow. When the sun shines and you have plenty of money, the shadow and the friend are both close to your heels; but when it comes to be dark, where is the shadow? and when your money is gone, and you want to borrow from the man who often borrowed from you, where is the friend?"

—The following parties have received license to marry since our last issue: Frederick Bech and Elizabeth Saltzman, Melvill Koder and Mary E. Cruse, Henry H. Leonard and Laura E. Aldrich, Lewis Brown and Rosa Widney, Wm. Groscop and Mary E. Hobel Thadden O. Worthington and Ella H. Little, Benjamin McKinley and Lovina D. Worley, John M. Bailey and Miss Maxwell.

—Toby Rush, who for the past three months has been attending a school of telegraphy, at Janesville, Wis., return- home last Friday.

—Miss Vada Haney, of Albion, who has been visiting friends in Auburn, returned home Monday.

—Fred. Clark voted last Tuesday for that bad man, Garfield, but his little ballot had no effect for the reason that we deposited one right on top of it for Hancock.

—The foundation of true politeness is a good and generous heart. It consists less in exterior manners than in the spirit developed in conducting the true intercourse of society.

—The Steuben Republican shows much enterprise in furnishing the election news ahead of the city dailies. We admire the enterprise of that excellent paper, but damn the news it brings.

—Our young townsman, Brown Matheny, has a position on the Muncie road, and makes his headquarters at Ft. Wayne. He is in excellent spirits and health, and says he prefers railroading to the drug business.

—An exchange remarks: A Tennessee editor has just published the ten commandments as an article of news. He is going to present some editorial comments on the death of Absalom as soon as his compositor gets sober.

—H. C. Rehm, for some months past a clerk in Frank Hoff's grocery establishment, has resigned his position there, and left last Tuesday for his home in Lima, this state.

—An Ohio woman in her will left an old arm chair to one of her sons. In the stuffing was found a roll of bank notes amounting to $400. The legal question is whether the money belongs to the son.

—Born, at Fort Wayne, Oct. 31, to the wife of Dr. T. J. Dills, a daughter. The many friends of the doctor in this county will be pleased to hear of his good luck, but regret that it was not a Hancock baby.

—We are authorized to state that Mr. Burt Yant, of Waterloo, will give instructions on the guitar to a class in this city, commencing Nov. 15. Parties wishing to join the class will please inform Mr. Wm. Forshey, who will give you rates, and other information.

MRS. J. E. ROSS, Sec'y.

—The Fort Wayne Sentinel has become much improved recently, and our citizens appreciate it, but for some time past it has failed to put in an appearance with anything like regularity. For the past few days, just when most needed, it has failed to come till the next day after publication.

—Twenty-one tickets were sold from Angola last Saturday to the grand rally at Auburn. Many more people would have availed themselves of the cheap rates and taken the trip had the officers of the company not seen fit to make a change in time and then change back to the hour first announced.—Steuben Republican.

—The following names have been selected for the petit jury for the December term of the circuit court:

A. E. Farrington,
Jere. Hamstreet,
G. B. Emerson,
B. F. Blair,
Wesley Jackman,
Joel. Mottinger,
J. A. Provines,
John Heitz,
J. E. Thompson,
Chas. Wanemaker,
Henry Hood,
J. C. St. Clair.

—The republicans here were hilarious Tuesday night, and kept up the most unearthly yells until almost daylight. Just before day some smart aleck sneaked up to the Swineford house and tied a piece of crape on the door. Mr. Swineford took it good naturedly, and merely remarked that it was put there by some damned government paupers.

—Some young gentlemen in the north part of town, so far forgot the teachings of their parents last Saturday evening in their hollow 'een raid as to upset an out-building of Uncle Johnny Brandon's. Monday their consciences and early teachings overtook them, and like little men, acknowledged the wrong done to a neighbor, and ask the privilege of repairing the injury, which being granted, they did.

—The Waterloo Press says: "The supreme court has confirmed the transfer to his wife, by Dr. Barnett, of his property in Butler. This defeats the attempt of Miss Leonard to realize upon the judgment she obtained against the doctor for malpractice, in setting her broken arm. Most persons who knew something of the circumstances, thought she never ought to have received the judgment.

—The carpenter work on the U. B. church, at Victor cemetery, in Union township, has been completed, and the board desire to state to the members of that organization that the work, under the supervision of Mr. A. L. Holopeter, has been highly satisfactory. The building will soon be ready for occupancy, and Mr. A. C. Brown, treasurer, wishes all subscribers to come forward within the next ten days and pay the amount subscribed.

—Defective flues cause nine-tenths of all the fires which occur during the fall and winter. Examine your chimneys carefully, and you may be saved the unpleasant sensation of being burned out of house and home some cold winter night.

Our young friend, W. S. Groscop took unto himself a wife last Tuesday evening in the person of Miss Mary Hebel, and he is now the happiest democrat in Auburn. We smoked, and so did many of his friends, who join in wishing for the new couple a long and happy wedded life. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Redick, of the German Reform church.

—A well-known gentleman went home in a rather how-come-you-so condition the other night, and, in reply to his wife's remonstrances, explained that he had been attending a meeting of a campaign club. "But how came all that mud on the shoulders of your coat?" she inquired. "Oh," he answered meekly, "I've been putting my shoulders to the wheel," and this concluded the hostilities for the night.

—We hear that a certain German minister in this town prevented his aged father from going to the polls Tuesday by locking him in a closet, because the old gentleman votes in opposition to his son. If the rumor is true, and it comes from good authority, the reverend gentleman might improve his qualifications for holy calling by a perusal of the golden rule, "Do unto others as you would that others should do unto you.

—The disease among horses seems to be spreading rapidly. The Steuben Republican says it has appeared in that county, and a number of cases in Angola. It resembles the old epizootic but is far more fatal. The first symptom is a dry, hacking cough, which is followed by a discharge from the left nostril. Sometimes there is a slight swelling in the throat, but not always. Those who own horses should be on the look out for the first appearance of the disease, and take means to cure it at once, otherwise there will be great danger that the animal will die.

—It seems strange that a republican would forget to vote, yet we have a case. Our postmaster, Mr. Joe Rainier, is one of the most zealous ones of that political faith. He went to the polls early Tuesday morning and worked all day, and when the polls closed he discovered that he had been so absorbed that he actually forgot to deposit his little ballot for Garfield. He is much chagrined over this republican loss, and takes the laughing and smoking at his expense like a little man.

—Last Tuesday night Jacob Neigh, of Sedan, gave a dance in the old hotel building, and at about 10 o'clock when the party were enjoying themselves, two brothers named Frank and Charles Mercer, of Corunna, came in and began abusing a gentleman named Ruff DeLong. Mr. DeLong made every effort to reconcile the boys, but they wouldn't have it that way, and began beating DeLong with a "billy," inflicting several painful wounds. The boys will be informed of what the laws say about carrying concealed weapons.

—In the editorial departments, Dr. Holland has something to say about the origin and history of Scribner. "There was," he says, "no popular magazine in existence which it took for a model. It aimed at a higher excellence in art than had hitherto been attempted, and a fresher, more vigorous and inspiring literature than had been exemplified in any popular periodical, American or foreign. It has not only accomplished what it undertook, but," he believes, "it has greatly modified and elevated the work of its contemporaries."

—At the residence of Mrs. Christian Swanders, of Richland township, was gathered a pleasant little party last Tuesday to celebrate the fifty-ninth birthday of that lady. Those present were Mr. and Mrs. Sam. Pommert, Mr. and Mrs. Sam. Campbell, Mr. and Mrs. George Grund, and Charlie Pommert and Miss Susie St. Clair, of Auburn, Mr and Mrs. John Swanders, of Churubusco, Fred. Smith, Mary Wilson, and Susan Hathaway, of that neighborhood. Mrs. Swanders was the recipient of a number of presents from the guests, for which she returns her sincere thanks.

—Our cotemporary, the Republican, appears to be in an embarrassed condition financially. The proprietor seems to have been somewhat remiss in meeting his obligations. An attachment was made on the Republican office yesterday for claims due and unpaid, and it is now in the hands of the sheriff. It would be quite an advantage to the smooth-running of a printing-office, or any other business, if the employes would contribute their services, but as this has been tried a number of times with absolute failure, it is surprising that it is persisted in by those who ought to know better.

—More people buy lottery tickets every month than is generally supposed. Men whom you would think long past the days of chance and adventure, regularly invest a couple of dollars. If they say anything about it to a confidential friend, it is simply the remark that they would rather have the chance of winning and lose two dollars than to keep that amount and not have the chance. The holder of a lottery ticket has one chance in fifty in drawing a prize. Then the pleasant anticipation and excitement accompanying the possession of a ticket is worth something, even if no prize is drawn.

LAST SATURDAY.

A Few Items Caught by a Courier Reporter.

Several residences on Main and Fifth streets were illuminated.

Provisions were made for five persons in the calaboose Saturday night.

With the first-voters of Fort Wayne the republicans got out about 829 torchlights Saturday night.

We must say that the first-voters—including those that couldn't vote—from Fort Wayne, made a good show.

The delegation from Fort Wayne was about two hours behind time, making the torch-light display rather late.

We must not neglect to mention that the St. Johns band was here Saturday, and that the boys are improving very rapidly.

Harry Yesbera loaned his torch Saturday morning and could not get it for the night demonstration, therefore he was not seen in the ranks.

We don't say this because Saturday was a republican day, but there was more drunkenness and carousing than Auburn has experienced in many a day.

If it hadn't been for the Fort Wayne boys, we would have had to borrow a lantern to have found the torch-light procession Saturday evening.

Excitement ran high at Hollister's restaurant Saturday evening, about the time the Wayne boys were ready to leave. One fellow left on the toe of Sherm's boot.

The leader of the Waterloo band, Johnnie Fisher, "lost his music" Saturday evening, and could not play in the parade at night. All the boys lose their music when the Corunna boys are present.

Frank Ray represented Garfield's boyhood days by riding "the mule," and it was a pretty fair representation of the gentleman, too; though Garfield never would have brought up the rear of such a thin procession.

He stood in Kiblinger's door-way; he whispered something in a lady's ear; he was caught at it by John Wittmer, who threw him in the ditch, and who would have fixed him up for the doctor's care had he not disappeared in the crowd.

As the Wayne boys were going to the train one of them remarked, in a tone loud enough to be heard four blocks, that any man who would vote for Hancock was a rebel and a s— of a b—. Jay VanAuken asked the gentleman to repeat, which he did, and now the lad carries his mouth in a sling—he's afraid he'll catch cold in his gums

It is rumored that upon this wonderful Saturday one of our loyal republicans, whose vile mouth never ceases to slander and abuse democrats, remarked that he had shot better men than Mr. Anthony Swineford. Mr. S. is an honorable, upright, industrious farmer, highly esteemed by all who know him, and commands respect where this shister never can or ever will, and Mr. Swineford would have only been doing himself justice if he had reproved the gentleman in the severest terms.

Finds Rest in Death.

Mr. John Gross, an old and respected citizen of Auburn, died at his home Friday morning, Oct. 29, at six o'clock. His death was not unexpected, as he has been an invalid for more than three years, and for two years has been confined almost constantly. For the past six months he had suffered at times the most intense agony, and knew that he was not long for this world, and often expressed himself as anxious to find relief in death from his terrible sufferings. The deceased was born in Landen county, Virginia, April 13, 1830, and his age was fifty years, six months and sixteen days. He has lived in Auburn eleven years, was a good citizen and enjoyed the respect and confidence of his fellow-man. He leaves a wife and one daughter.

A Correction.

So far as Mr. S. L. Morris gave the COURIER occasion for somewhat harsh criticism last week, we are satisfied that the occasion was an entirely exceptional one with him. We are assured that in his treatment of political adversaries Mr. Morris is usually highly considerate and gentlemanly, and his deportment at all times characterized by the utmost kindness and a high sense of honor and manhood. We regret therefore any little intemperance of expression on his part should not have been allowed to pass without quite so severe animadversion by us. Our informant was incorrect in charging Mr. Morris with using vulgar language, and from this charge we desire to distinctly exhonerate him.

THE SCHOOLMASTER'S SLEEP.

The schoolmaster was weary,
Was weary, old, and gray;
And a vision came o'er him
Upon that summer day.

A heaviness of spirit,
And nameless sense of pain,
He struggled hard to banish,
But struggled all in vain.

The drowsy school-room murmur
He heard, and, in his trance,
He knew his school were watching
His face with stealthy glance.

He knew, and, for a moment,
He roused himself again,
To battle off the stupor
That crushed his weary brain.

In vain, for, with the effort,
His head dropped on his breast,
His breath came faint and fainter,
And soon he sank to rest.

And then arose an uproar!
And boundless was the glee
Among those little scholars
The schoolmaster to see.

And all the little urchins,
And maidens shouts with joy;
And, with a tear of laughter,
Cry what a funny boy (the dunce).

An hour now was passing,
And still the master slept,
And greater grew the tumult
These little scholars kept,

Until a little maiden,
Who watched the haggard face,
With grave concern and wonder,
Stole softly from her place,—

Stole softly to the master,
And gently touched his head,
And started back in terror—
The schoolmaster was dead!

'SQUIRE BLAKE'S LOSS.

Mrs. Blake was house cleaning. With the assistance of Deborah, a colored woman, she had been hard at work for nearly a week; to-day they had come to the family sitting room, which besides being cleaned was to be newly papered. At this point the 'Squire had mildly declared that he "didn't see the need of turning everything upside down, if they were cleaning boxes."

The room opening from the sitting room was lower in the walls than that, thus giving space for two small closets, one on each side of the chimney. It had been thought best to have these papered over, they were too high for frequent use. Mrs. Blake had a plot in her mind regarding them, and that was to fill them with some old books which were now "only lumbering up the house," in her view, though if the Squire had been told of this, his opinion might have been quite different for he seemed to have a mania for second-hand books, and bought all he came across.

In the 'Squire's family lived a boy by the name of Archie Turner, who was a child of a neighbor of the Blakes. About a year before our story begins, his parents died, leaving him and a sister without relatives or money; the 'Squire, seeing that he was a smart, intelligent boy, and wanting some one to help about the "chores," had taken him to live with them, where he was considered as one of the family; his sister found a home with some friends in the neighboring town of Chelton.

'Squire Blake was not a poor man, and there would sometime be, as the neighbors said, "quite a fortune to fall to somebody." So Archie was considered to be very fortunate in having a home here, for the 'Squire and his wife had often spoken of adopting a boy, their only child being the little Amy, a girl of eight or nine years—and now it looked as thought Archie might be the boy whom they would adopt.

But while we have wandered from the scene at the beginning, the cleaning has progressed finely; Mrs. Blake has called Archie to go with her to the attic to help bring down some books which have been crowded out of the house. She selected some volumes, and taking an armful, left Archie to do the same, and went down stairs. As she entered the sitting-room she was met by Mr. Stevens, a wealthy farmer.

"How'd do, Mrs. Blake," said he; "cleaning house, I reckon; well, I won't hinder you long. I couldn't find the Squire anywhere's round, so I just dropped in to leave that money you heard him tell of, very likely; if he hain't to home no matter. Guess I can trust it to you;" and with a good-natured "ha, ha," in appreciation of the joke, he produced a generous pocket-book, and taking from it a roll of bills, counted out the sum wanted, and handed it to Mrs. Blake. "The 'Squire understands; there is no need of a receipt," he said; then, with a "good day," he was gone.

Mrs. Blake stood a moment with the money in her hands—one hundred dollars—when she was startled by hearing a cry from Deborah; hastily dropping the bills, she ran to her assistance, and found her swaying mournfully back and forth,

"It's done gone'n broke my arm now fo' sure," she wailed. Mrs. Blake helped her to a more comfortable place than the kitchen floor, and ascertained the fact that she had fallen down some steps. The broken arm proved to be nothing more serious than a sprained wrist; that was bad enough, however, in Deborah's opinion, though it "might ha' ben wusser," she confessed.

Mrs. Blake bathed her wrist, and at length she was in a condition to go home. Meanwhile, Archie had packed the books away in the closets and had busied himself out of doors.

It had taken some time to "straighten things out," as Mrs. Blake expressed it, after Deborah's accident, and the money was not thought of again until after tea when suddenly Mrs. Blake exclaimed, "Land sakes, Reuben, Mr. Stevens was here to-day and left that money; bless me, I hain't thought of it since. I've been so hurried."

The 'Squire turned a few leaves of his book. "Well, where is it now, I wonder?" but his wife had gone to the sitting-room.

"Bring a light, Reuben; I'm sure I left it here." A light was carried in, but no money was to be found. They searched carefully around that and the other rooms; Amy and Archie joined them, but without success.

"Deborah wouldn't take it, of course," said the 'Squire, doubtfully.

"No, indeed," his wife answered, turning her pocket wrong side out. "No; besides it was when I heard her cry that I left it here and went to her."

"And was no one else here after that?"

"No one, except"—Mrs. Blake hesitated—"no one but Archie."

Neither of them spoke for a moment, but the same thought was in the minds of both, and later, when the children had gone to bed, they talked the matter over and made a search, which proved as fruitless as the first.

"I can't think Archie would take it," said the 'Squire.

"I don't want to think so, but where has it gone? And you know, Rueben, how anxious he was to go to Chelton."

It was agreed, however, not to say anything to Archie for a few days, "for it may come out yet," they said.

But the days passed, and the money did not come out, so it was thought that Archie must know something about it.

Both looked very sober; it was hard to believe that the boy they had known so long and who seemed to them almost like their own, should be guilty of what they feared.

"Well," said the 'Squire, "I suppose I may as well speak to him about it;" so after breakfast, which Amy and Archie alone enjoyed, he called the latter back after the others had left the room. The boy came back and stood expectantly before him, while he looked uneasily about him as if for some way to escape. At last he broke the silence by saying, "Archie, I can't tell how sorry I am to say this—to think it; but we can not forget that you were the only one in the room where the money was left, so we think—that is—no doubt it was a great temptation, but tell us the truth, that will be the best for us all."

Archie stood silent a moment; the color left his face, as he stood looking up, "O, you don't think I—I stole it!"

"We hope not; but if it is true, tell us now, and we will forgive you."

"But I didn't take it," cried the boy; "can't you believe me? look in my room, look—"

Mrs. Blake entered the room just then. "O, it isn't likely it would be among his things now," she interrupted, speaking more sternly than usual; probably being conscious of her own carelessness in the matter, she was more willing to blame some one else.

Archie's eyes filled with tears, and he turned with a mute glance of appeal, that touched the heart of one, at least, of his accusers, but the 'Squire left the room. He talked with the boy after this, but nothing could make him confess his guilt.

The time passed, and it was decided that Archie should go to Chelton; a place was found for him, and he, poor boy, was glad to get away from the reproachful faces of his former friends, for Amy alone believed him innocent.

"I just know you didn't take the old money, so there!"

After he was gone, though she missed her playmate at first, it was the 'Squire who felt his absence most. As for his wife she hardened her heart against him, declaring they were well rid of the little thief.

There was no more talk of adopting a boy. Occasionally they heard of Archie, and the report was always a good one. In course of time the lost money was forgotten by all but those whom it mostly concerned.

Ten years have passed since the day Farmer Stevens called at 'Squire Blake's and left the money which so soon disappeared, and again it is house cleaning time; there are several rooms to be papered this time, and among them the sitting room.

Amy is now a young lady just out of school; at present she is standing in the doorway of the room, watching the man as he tears off the paper, as it was thought best to do before the new was put on.

"Why!" she exclaimed, as one piece came off, "what is this, a little door?"

"Yes, don't you remember the closets we had papered over years ago?" said her mother.

Her curiosity regarding them was not satisfied till she had climbed some steps and had with difficulty pried open the doors of one.

"Why, it's full of books!" she exclaimed.

"I have good reason to remember when they were put in; it was at the time Archie Turner stole that money of your father's," said her mother.

Amy stood looking over the books when suddenly, with an exclamation of surprise, she sprang down the steps and went after her mother, who had left the room.

"I have found it!" she exclaimed, excitedly.

"Found what, child?"

For answer, Amy opened a book and held it before her mother, disclosing the lost money, nicely laid away where it had been undisturbed since the day Mrs. Blake had unconsciously dropped it before going to attend Deborah.

When the 'Squire came home there was quite a story for him to hear. After it was finished, he sat a moment wiping his spectacles, then putting them on, remarked, "Bless the boy, I never could quite believe he took it."

Of course Archie must be acquainted with the discovery, and the 'Squire suddenly remembered that he had business in Chelton the next day. Accordingly the morning saw him on his way; the young law student was much surprised by this call from the 'Squire.

"You don't know how hard it has been all this time to think that you believed that I had taken the money," he said after the story was told.

"But I know it has been hard to believe it," was the reply.

Archie gladly accepted an invitation to visit the Blakes, where he was welcomed by all, and the friendship between him and Amy was not less than it had been in their childhood. But it came to pass in the course of a few years that he became the son of 'Squire Blake, though not by adoption.

Awful Retribution.

A writer on Australian life, in the Boston Commercial Bulletin, tells how a sick man was found by his mate at the diggings murdered, and his gold gone. The culprit was found, but contrived that night to escape with the money, which, for safe keeping had been placed in the place of detention. Nothing could be heard of him, but a few days later came the following: "Mr. Magistrate: Jim Bell (the murdered man) was once a mate of mine. He was a good man. You will find his murderer at the head of Dead Horse Gully. I have kept the gold for a reward. KANGAROO BILL,
"Captain of the Bush-rangers."

They found the murderer's remains—a fleshless skeleton, every bone being picked clean. He had been staked down to the ground, with his back to an ant-hill, and left for the ants to eat him alive. A more awful retribution can scarcely be conceived.

THE FAMILY DOCTOR.

FOR A COUGH.—For a tight, hoarse cough, where phlegm is not raised, or with difficulty, take hot water often—as hot as can be sipped. This will give immediate and permanent relief. Don't fail to try this remedy because it is simple.

FOR A SPRAIN.—The white of an egg, into which a piece of alum about the size of a walnut has been stewed until it forms a jelly, is a fine remedy for sprains. It should be laid over the sprain on a piece of lint and changed as often as it becomes dry.

CATARRH.—The best way to deal with the disease is not to have it—to keep clean, to eat wholesome food, to live in clean, well-ventilated houses, to dress warmly with flannels next the skin, and, above all, to keep the feet warm and dry. Children sitting with damp shoes on are almost certain to contract catarrh. The evaporation of the moisture produces a constant chilliness which is dangerous even to those in robust health. Children's feet and legs are ordinarily not more than half clothed, and it is little wonder that catarrh is so prevalent among them.

THE EAR.—Dr. Roosa, in a lecture on the ear, said that no small amount of trouble in the ear was caused by too frequent syringing and boring out with a twisted towel or handkerchief, not to mention hair-pins, bodkins and other metallic instruments. In his opinion, one should never put anything in the ear smaller than the little finger, although one writer said put nothing smaller than the elbow. The avoidance of many ear troubles was to be assured by taking care not to duck the head in cold water, or to syringe the deeper part without the order of a physician, or introduce any body which can push the wax lower down in the drum.

BURNS.—The best application for a burn is a liniment made of lime water and oil, beaten together until it looks like butter melted to dress vegetables for the table. It matters not whether common lime or the chloride of lime is used, and either sweet or linseed oil will answer. Wrap the burned part in fine linen covered with this mixture, and cover thickly on the outside with raw cotton to exclude the air. Open it but once in twenty-four hours, and then carefully soak off the rag with lime water and oil, so as not to injure the tender skin that may be forming on the wound. Bathe well with the liniment, and put on a clean dressing of rags wet with the liniment, and cover with cotton as at first. Where lime cannot be had, the next best dressing we know of is soot mixed with lard, well melted and strained to get out the particles of soot. In this case you may first use strong alum water to assuage the pain, and then put on a plaster of the above. In any case, over the rags put raw cotton, to exclude the air and keep the part from being rubbed.

American Incomes.

There is no table of the average duration of fortunes; but the statistics of business failures in the country since 1866 show that the average yearly failures ranged from 1 in 163 in the year 1871 to 1 in 75 in 1876. How many business men in a thousand fail, once or more, during their business lifetime, I cannot learn. The proportion used to be estimated for New England at 97 per cent. That is probably too high a figure for the business of to-day, conducted, as it is, upon much shorter credits than formerly. But the proportion of traders who fail is probably not lower than 75 per cent. of the whole number.

How many of our people live upon their invested means? In 1866 our income-tax returns showed 771,000 incomes of $500 per year and over, and 6,000,000 incomes of less than $500. But these were not incomes from capital; they were mostly earnings or wages. Probably not one in a hundred of these smaller incomes, and not over 10 per cent. of the incomes over $500, represented the interest upon investments. In France, ten years later, the census returned no less than 2,000,000 people, rentiers, who live entirely upon their invested means. In 1877 7,500,000 of people, one-fifth of the population, were enrolled as rentes-holders or savings-banks depositors; but it must be added that the savings banks do not often fail in France, and that sooner or later they are apt to fail with us. Most of these deposits are small ones. But no less than 2,000,000 of the French can say with Petrarch, Parva sed apta mihi: "It is little enough, but it will do for me."

Thus, in spite of the resources of the country, in spite of the almost universal search for wealth, and in spite of the fact that we have a great many rich men at any given time, we still do not have a large class of permanently rich men; we do not even have, like the French, a large class of persons who have a permanent though small competence. The rich American's wealth is extremely volatile; in nine cases out of ten it is "fairy gold." The old land-owners form the chief exception to the rule; especially in our large cities, where the increase of values has been great.

But if our class of permanently wealthy people is small, so also is our class of destitute people. We are fortunate in having no such immense and harmful inequality of fortunes as we see in modern England. Our ill fortune is this, that our class of moderate competences is also small, that so few of us, in spite of our opportunities and our labors, have seized the good of even a small assured competence. The land is full of people who have not, on the other hand, and who are not likely to have, any assured competence, however moderate, but who have nothing to expect but labor to the end. This is, indeed, the appointed human lot for the majority in any community; but need it be, in a country of resources like this, so nearly the universal lot? Might not many of us avoid it by a greater care for a moderate competence, a lessened ambition for fortunes?—T. M. Coan, in Harper's Magazine.

Turkish Baths for Horses.

A novelty in the method of treating horses afflicted with rheumatism, influenza, pleurisy, filled legs, coughs, etc., has been established at a horse infirmary in New York city. The animal receives a Turkish bath, similar to those given human beings, and, it is claimed, with the same beneficial effect. The bath is a square room, about ten feet by ten in size, the floor being of stone. A furnace capable of emitting an intense degree of heat is attached to the room; flues underneath the floor conveying it into the apartment. When the afflicted horse enters the temperature of the room is about 90 degrees Fahrenheit. The warmth is gradually increased until 140 degrees is reached. The horse sweats copiously, and hand-rubbing of two attendants brings out a mass of lather. This operation performed, the horse is shampooed with cold water, and led into the fresh air. The cold-water treatment closes the pores of the skin and thwarts the danger of taking cold. Although the Turkish bath for horses is quite common in England, this is probably the only one in America.

Indians' Love for Their Children.

A year or two ago, the daughter of an Indian chief, who had been educated in New York, returned to the Reservation as a teacher. The tribe were roused to envy when they saw one of their own number thus made, to all appearance, the equal of the whites.

The Indians are passionately fond of their children; and in every wigwam, fathers and mothers schemed how they should gain like advantages for their boys and girls. Just at this time, the proprietor of a traveling circus visited the Reservation with his miserable worn-out horses and performers, and being struck by the bright, eager face and fearless riding of a young girl of fourteen, went to her father and offered to educate her in the East and send her home a lady if he would allow her to go with him.

The credulous Indian consented. The circus started in the night, and the girl went with it. It was two days before the story reached the agent and missionary, who sent for the girl's father, and told him how he had been duped by the showman, whose purpose was undoubtedly to train her for the ring. The Indian stood silent for a moment; then, raising both hands to heaven, he cried,—

"O God, visit not my ignorance on my child!"

Without another word, he started in pursuit. He had no horse, nor money to pay his fare on the railway. He traveled four hundred miles on foot before he recovered his child, uninjured, though worn to a skeleton from exhaustion and hunger.

We, to whom education, as a rule, comes as freely as air or sunshine, can have little conception of the hungry despair with which these copper-colored brothers in Indian wigwams covet the opportunity which we hold so cheaply. There is no sight more pathetic than a human being struggling vainly for that knowledge which will make a man of it instead of a brute.

An Omaha teacher tells us that the children of that tribe came last winter to school, walking from two to six miles. The hunt last year failed, and they had no mocassins. Their bare feet marked their way on the ice and snow with bloody prints.

How many white children would do this of their own accord? Two schools at the East are now open to Indian children under the care of the Goverment, one at Carlisle, Pa., and the Industrial Training School at Hampton, Va. It is the object of the Goverment to send back these educated youths as teachers to civilize and elevate their tribes.

Lofty Towers.

The crown of William Penn's hat, which is to adorn his thirty-six foot statue surmounting the lofty tower of the new Philadelphia public buildings, will be just 535 feet from the pavement. This is higher than any other tower yet constructed. Trinity steeple, in New York City, which seems so imposing with its height of 284 feet, shrinks into insignificance in comparison with the lofty spire which is intended to be the crowning glory of Penn Square. The highest towers which have yet been constructed are those of the Cologne Cathedral, which have at present a height of 524 feet 11 inches, or 10 feet 1 inch below Mr. Penn's proposed hat. As, however, the Cologne towers are still unfinished, and aim at an ultimate altitude of 576 feet 9 inches, the Penn Square Tower may never enjoy the distinction of being the highest in the world. The following are the heights of some of the chief lofty buildings: Tower of St. Nicholas, at Hamburg, 473 feet 1 inch; cupola of St. Peter's, Rome, 469 feet 2 inches; Cathedral spire at Strasburg, 465 feet 11 inches; pyramid of Cheops, 449 feet 5 inches; tower of St. Stephen's, Vienna, 443 feet 10 inches; tower of St. Martin's, Landshut, 431 feet 8 inches; Cathedral spire at Frieburg, 410 feet 1 inch; Cathedral at Antwerp, 404 feet 10 inches; Cathedral at Florence, 390 feet 5 inches; St. Paul's, London, 365 feet 1 inch; ridge tiles of Cologne Cathedral, 360 feet 3 inches; Cathedral tower at Madgeburg, 339 feet 11 inches; tower of the new Votive Church at Vienna, 314 feet 11 inches; tower of the Rathhaus at Berlin, 288 feet 8 inches; and the towers of Notre Dame at Paris, 232 feet 11 inches. —Philadelphia Press.

The Horrors of Chinese Warfare.

It is horrible to contemplate, says the British Medical Journal, that in the not improbable event of hostilities breaking out between Russia and China in Central Asia, large armies will be sent into the field by the latter power unaccompanied by medical officers, and unprovided with ambulances, bandages, or surgical appliances of any kind. The sick and wounded of these armies will have only comradeship to look to for succor; and when rapid advances or retreats are being effected, comradeship is, of course, of no avail, so that they will be left to perish miserably where they fall. It is almost incredible that an empire, boasting an ancient civilization and celestial culture, should be so careless of the lives of its defenders as to make not the faintest attempt to supply them with aid when struck down by the casualties of warfare; yet such is the case, and in previous campaigns in China the scenes witnessed on a field of battle for days after the conflict was over, when the wounded were slowly dying in protracted agonies by the side of the dead, have been indescribably hideous and painful. This neglect of sick and wounded soldiers is a great blot on Chinese civilization.

ACCORDING to a Viennese statistical journal, Austria is better provided with public libraries than any other country in Europe.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

IRON is rolled so thin at the Pittsburgh (Pa.) iron mills that 10,000 sheets are required to make a single inch in thickness.

PROF. SILVESTRI finds that the summit of Mount Etna has been lowered about forty feet as a result of recent volcanic activity.

ACCORDING to recent statistics, taking 1,000 well-to-do persons and 1,000 poor persons, after five years there remained alive of the prosperous 943, of the poor only 655. After fifty years there remained of the prosperous 557, of the poor 283; at seventy years of age there remained 235 of the prosperous, and of the poor 65.

A RECORD of the weather kept nearly three centuries ago by the famous astronomer, Tycho Brahe, on the coast of Denmark, has lately been published at Copenhagen by the Royal Danish Academy of Sciences. The manuscript had found its way into the imperial library at Vienna, where it was discovered a few years since.

THE size attained by icebergs is sometimes prodigious. From measurements made upon one Dr. Hayes estimated it to contain about 27,000,000,000 feet while its weight must have been not less than 1,000,000,000 tons. It was grounded in water nearly half a mile in depth. What, then, must have been the thickness and the size of the glacier from which this mass had become detached!

A VERY curious proof of the identity of animal and vegetable protoplasm has been supplied by Claude Bernard, who has shown that both are alike sensitive to the influence of anæsthetics. Exposed to ether, a sensitive plant no longer closed its leaflets when touched. Assimilation and growth, as well as germination, are arrested by chloroform. Schutzenberger has proved that the fresh cells of the yeast plant breathe like an aquatic animal.

Will Education Yield Subsistence?

An education, yes; but what sort of an education? A bricklayer's education, an artisan's, a farmer's, would, indeed, help him to earn a living. A college education would give him a social advantage, but it would not, in itself, increase his chance of earning a living; it would rather diminish it. For, as was pointed out in an interesting paper lately published in this magazine, our colleges do not, like the French and German universities, instruct a young man in the bread-winning pursuits; the American colleges are, on the contrary, institutions for general culture. I do not take up the question here of the amount and value of the culture they supply. The point for us to note is that the educated young American who has not a special education as a bread-winner is worse off, as to his money prospects, than the young American who has no college education at all. Dig he cannot, and to beg he is ashamed. Two of the professions at least are fatally overcrowded. The United States, with a population not greatly larger than that of the German empire, graduates every year five times as many physicians; for the German empire limits the number of its doctors, and we do not limit that of ours. Very many of our physicians not only wait years for practice, but never get into practice at all. It is much the same with the profession of law. In both professions there are prizes for a few, and failures, more or less complete, for the many. The engineering, mining, and other scientific professions offer a somewhat better chance, and public life, almost neglected as a profession, will attract a better class of young men from year to year. But upon none of these, save in favored and exceptional cases, as where a son succeeds to his father's practice, can a young man depend for a fortune, or even for immediate support. They, too, offer a certain social dignity. But as a rule it is the laborer, artisan, or tradesman that has the better chance of supporting himself; it is the educated man that has, more frequently, to wait before he can pay his way. If, therefore, we educate our sons, it is all the better reason why we should provide, not indeed for their independence, but some aid during the years which they are likely to spend in waiting before they can achieve their position.

It is to be remembered, too, that these years of waiting may become, with such aid, years of scholarly or scientific accomplishment, if not of money-making; years of strengthened preparation; years that might introduce and brighten a career, instead of wasted years that cloud or spoil it.—T. M. Coan, in Harper's Magazine.

A Spider's Cradle.

A certain spider—found in the southern part of Europe—makes a curious cradle to preserve her babies through the cold winter, so that the spider family shall not be exterminated. She makes a silk case somewhat the shape of a balloon upside down, not quite half an inch long, and fitted with a door, or cover, which may be opened, though she leaves it carefully closed. In this are placed the eggs, from which little spiders will come in the spring. To protect them from enemies and from cold the anxious mamma makes an outer case of exactly the same shape, only about an inch long, and of course larger all around, also fitted with a closed door. Between the two cases the space is stuffed with a golden-brown colored silk, which she spins herself, and makes it warm and comfortable inside. The whole thing is hung to a bush, and left throughout the winter.

The Origin of the Morgue.

The word "morgue" had originally a far different meaning from that which it now bears. In old dictionaries it is defined as a "surly, haughty look," being derived from the word morguer, "to bully, to dare." It is also used (the verb) to express the idea of inspecting or viewing intently and closely any person or object. Madame de Sevigne, in a letter to Madame de Grignan, uses it thus, when she writes: "Guitant writes me from Saint-Ange three leagues from Fontainebleau, where he has gone to morguer the Court." The Morgue was originally the second guichet or wicket at the Grand-Chatelet. When newly arrested prisoners were marched in there, the turnkeys used to halt them in front of this wicket in order that the jailers might morguer them at their ease, that is to say, look them over attentively, and engrave their features in the memory. It was there afterwards, that the corpses picked up on the public street, or dragged from the Seine, were deposited for recognition. Later, in 1804, there was constructed upon the Qua du Marche-Neuf, at the northeast angle of the Pont Saint-Michel, a square building specially set apart for the exhibition of the unknown bodies. The opening of new boulevards has singularly modified that quarter, and the morgue is to-day removed to the extremity of the Cite, upon that little island a long time since united to the main land, and which was in former days called "La Motte aux Papelards" (The Hillock of the Hypocrites). The exhibition-room consists of two divisions, separated by a glass partition running from the floor to the ceiling, and from one side of the room to the other, through which partition the visitor sees lying on the twelve dalles, or stone forms, the dead bodies, sometimes partially clothed, again entirely naked save a little strip of linen about the waist. One of the most pathetic sights we ever witnessed there was the corpse of a little child not more than 3 years of age, seated in a "high-chair" just as she was drawn from the river, her baby rattle clutched still in her tiny fingers, her little white cap on her head, and wearing the customary short blouse of the children of the ouvriers. Poor little baby! she had tumbled in the Seine while at play, perhaps, while her mother was busily at work in some lavoir near by.—American (Paris) Register.

A New Story of Lincoln.

Gen. Steel, being the oldest member in continuous service of the Indiana Legislature, was appointed Chairman of the committee delegated by the Legislature to meet President Lincoln at the State line and escort him to Indianapolis. At Lafayette there was an immense gathering of people to greet the President, and an earnest call by them for a speech, a wish which he seemed very reluctant to comply with. Finding, however, that he must say something to quiet the multitude, he related the following: He said his situation reminded him of a man out in Illinois, who was a candidate for nomination for an office. The convention at which the nomination was to be made was held at a town some miles distant from where the candidate resided. On the morning of the day on which the nomination was to be made, the candidate hired a team to take him to the scene of his hopes. The horse proved very slow. The man pounded and swore, and swore and pounded, but with his best efforts he did not get through till after the convention had adjourned and his hopes were blasted. He returned home in a frame of mind which you can imagine. The horse had been hired of the foreman of the livery stable, and was returned to him.

Our candidate did not waste much of his powder on the foreman, but, on his way home, meeting the owner, he denounced him in the strongest terms for letting him have such a horse. The owner said there must be some mistake about it; that his horses were all good travelers, and finally persuaded him to return to the stable to find out the trouble. When they got to the stable, the owner asked the man in charge what horse he had given the man. "I gave him the hearse horse." "Hearse horse! hearse horse!" exclaimed the man. "Why, if a man should start to a funeral with such a horse as that, he would not reach the grave till two weeks after the resurrection," and, said Mr. Lincoln, if I make a speech in every town I pass through, I shall not reach Washington till two weeks after the inauguration.—Chicago Inter Ocean.

Put Life into Your Work.

A young man's interest and duty both dictate that he should make himself indispensable to his employers.

A young man should make his employer his friend, by doing faithfully and minutely all that is entrusted to him.

It is a great mistake to be over-nicely fastidious about work. Pitch in readily and your willingness will be appreciated, while the "high-toned" young man who quibbles about what it is, and about what it is not his place to do, will get the cold shoulder. There is a story that George Washington once helped to roll a log that one of his corporals would not handle, and the greatest Emperor of Russia worked as a shipwright in England—to learn the business. That's just what you want to do. Be energetic, look and act with alacrity, take an interest in your employer's success, work as though the business was your own, and let your employer know that he may place absolute reliance in your word and on your act. Be mindful; have your mind in your business; because it is that which is going to help you, not those outside attractions which some of the "boys" are thinking about. Take a pleasure in work, do not go about it in a listless, formal manner, but with alacrity and cheerfulness, and remember that while working thus for others, you are laying the foundation of our own success in life.—Our Morning Guide.

The Narvous Man.

"I had my misgivin's, boss," the waiter said to the landlord, who was questioning him about his conduct toward the tall gentleman in blue clothes who sat at the third table from the door, "I had my suspicions when he sat down dat he was carryin' more whisky dan was good for 'im, but he was puffekly quiet an' behave himself well enough, and I didn't pay no attention to it outwell he pick up a baked potato, and hole it car'fully over de aig glass wid his left hand, and began to tap de end of de potato wid his spoon. He hit it right smart three or four times, an' den he whack it once or twice on de aige of de plate, an' lookin' solemn as a owl all de time, he call me up to 'im, an' say jest as p'lite and dignified as a President, 'waitah,' he say, 'I wish you would jest fix dis biled aig for me, if you please; I'se lorse a good deal of sleep las' night, an' I'm a little narvous dis mawnin',' he says; an' know I hadn't done ought for to laugh, boss, but I hope to die ef I could help it." The landlord didn't discharge him, under the circumstances.—R. J. Burdette.

The Personal Appearance of Robert Burns.

So far as we can form any correct judgment, Burns was one of the noblest-looking men of his age. Walter Scott, at the age of 15, saw the poet, and it made an enduring impression. He describes him as follows: "His body was strong and robust, and his appearance was rustic, but not clownish. His manner, though plain, was marked by dignified simplicity. His countenance was more massive than it appears in his portraits. His eyes were large and glowed (I say literally glowed) when he spoke on any subject with feeling or deep interest. I never saw such another eye in any other man, though I have seen the most distinguished characters of the age." The above-mentioned interview is interesting, as the picture of one poet given by another. It occurred at a social dinner when Scott was merely a spectator, but he attracted attention by replying to a question which no other person in the room could answer, and his reward was a smile and an approving word from the poet. How little did the inspired plowman imagine that the lame boy, who then attracted his attention, would reach such a distinction—still less that they two would divide the highest honors in the literature of their native land! The Burns statue will attract more attention than that of any author in Central Park (except Irving), not because he won the admiration of Scotland, but because he touched the heart with peculiar mastery. He thus won a place in human affection which he will probably always retain. Hence the statue is one of the most welcome and appropriate benefactions the Central Park has thus far enjoyed.—New York Cor. Rochester Democrat.

NEVER MISSED.

[From the Zanesville Times.]

Many of our readers may be benefited by the following reliable statement from Messrs. A. Heilman & Son, the well-known druggists of this city, who write: We have sold thousands of bottles of that valued medicine—Hamburg Drops—and every bottle that we have sold has always cured. It never missed. We recommend it as the best medicine we ever sold, and could furnish statements of cures, sufficient to fill the largest paper printed.

American Tobacco.

While I was at Ferrieres, in Italy, I heard a comical story from the wife of an American gentleman who resides in the neighborhood. It seems tobacco is a Government monopoly; the raising of more than a dozen plants by any one person is strictly prohibited. The gardener engaged by my friend had rather a liking for the plant, and embellished several of his ornamental flower-beds with it. So one day the lady was waited upon by the Commissaire, who informed her that, as she had transgressed the rules respecting the cultivation of tobacco by non-authorized individuals, she would have to pay a fine of some $30. But, fortunately, the Republican Deputy from the district was on terms of great intimacy with the family, and he offered his services to get them out of the scrape. He went, therefore, to call on the local Magistrate, and represented to him that the offending plants were of American origin, and, consequently, were of a kind that were totally valueless for any other purpose than that of ornamentation. The dignitary professed himself as being quite satisfied with the explanation, and, in view of the non-existence in commerce of any such an article as American tobacco, my friend got off scot free.—Lucy Hooper.

Rings Versus Seats.

A queer story is told of an eminent preacher at Norwich, England. On the occasion of a State service to a crowded house he made a sudden pause in his sermon, and read in a sonorous voice the irrelevant quotation from the second chapter of St. James: "For if there come unto your assembly a man with a gold ring, in goodly apparel, and there come in also a poor man in vile raiment, and ye have respect to him that weareth the gay clothing, and say unto him, sit thou here in a good place; and say to the poor, stand thou there, or sit here under my footstool, are ye not then partial in yourselves and are become judges of evil thoughts?" The congregation was stupified. Having thus rivited their attention, he addressed himself by name to a gentleman in the gallery: "Has that poor man who stands at the back of your pew a gold ring on his finger?"

The gentleman turned round, and replied:

"I believe not, sir."

"Oh, then, I suppose that is the reason he must not have a seat."

The gentleman had three gold rings on his hand, and his pew was nearly empty, but, as may be imagined, it did not long remain so.

The daughter of an English clergyman five years ago dashed into the sea and saved the lives of two "women of high position"—Edmund Yates can hardly, under the circumstances, call them ladies—and they left their preserver exhausted and senseless on the beach without even inquiring her name. The young lady has been ill ever since, is poor and friendless, and almost dying. She has never heard of the people whose life she saved.

ONE SOFT MAY DAY.

BY ILDEGERTE.

Kissed by a rose, one soft May day,
  A lily in the garden blowing—
Kissed by a rose, one soft May day,
  A lily in the garden growing.
Be my bride, oh! lily fair,
  Be my bride, my pale white queen.
The lily smiled with radiant air,
  Smiling sweetly and serene.

Kissed by a rose, one soft May day,
  A lily crushed was dying—
Kissed by a rose, one soft May day,
  A fragile fragment lying.
My bride is a corpse, the rose had said,
  And the air was full of its breath;
My fair white queen is lying dead,
  And I, * * * the cause of her death.

A red, red rose, one soft May day,
  Was culled from the garden flowers;
The daisy sighed for the bright red ray,
  So beautiful in the morning hours.
The flowers came where the red rose lay,
  Dead and purple, on the lily's breast,
And sad were the hearts, that soft May day—
  The red, red rose had gone to its rest.

One Sunday night we were sitting out in the moonlight, unusually silent, almost sad. Suddenly some one—a poetic-looking man, with a gentle, lovely face—said, in a low tone, "Did you ever think of the beautiful lesson the stars teach us?" A sewing machine agent, in driving through Monroe County, Kentucky, drew up before a cottage and asked a beardless sixteen-year-old boy, standing in the yard, if his mother was at home. "She is, but she don't live here," he answered. "I'm the head of this house." Finding the boy married, the agent went inside and encountered a child, who said she was the boy's wife, and that when she was married she was not eleven years old. "What on earth did you marry for?" asked the agent. "What do other folks marry for?" the child replied. The boy said he intended to buy a sewing machine for his wife when she got old enough to sew. "Come around in three or four years," he said, "and I'll take one."

A Word to Our Readers.

When you read of a remedy that will cure all diseases, beware of it; but when you read of a pure vegetable compound which claims to cure only certain parts of the body, and furnishes high proof that it does this, you can safely try it and with the assurance that it will help you. This is just what Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure does. It cures all troubles of the lower portion of the body, and none other. It will not help the tooth-ache, ear-ache, nor consumption, but it will put your body in a vigorous and healthy state where you can enjoy life and appreciate its good things. Try it.

Had a Shock.

"Yes," Mr. Messenger replied, in answer to the young lady's remark, "he was rather fond of bathing, very fond of it, in fact, but he received a terrible shock a few summers ago while in the water, and he has never recovered from it." "My," she exclaimed, "did a snake bite him? Oh, dreadful!" "No," Mr. Messenger said, "it wasn't that." "Did he come near drowning, then?" she wanted to know. "No," he said, "it wasn't that exactly, but, just as he was about ready to come out of the river, he saw a tramp going up over the hill, about a quarter of a mile away, with his hat, his pocketbook, his vest, his watch, his handkerchief, his stockings, his cigar-case, his shoes, his gloves, his collar, his necktie, his shirt-stud and collar-buttons, his s-s-suspenders, his cane, and well, in fact, his trousers. And there was a Sunday-school picnic only half a mile down the river, gradually coming nearer, and he lounged around among the willows all that day, and walked home alone in the starlight. And the fact was, he had never been able to enjoy a swim very much since that time."—Burlington Hawk-Eye.

Perfect Success.

A Lost Note.

In 1740, a director of the Bank of England lost a £30,000 bank note, which he was persuaded had fallen from the chimney-piece of his room into the fire. The bank directors gave the loser a second bill, upon his agreement to restore the first bill should it ever be found, or pay the money if presented by any stranger. "About thirty years afterward," says Mr. Francis, "the director having been long dead, and his heirs in possession of his fortune, an unknown person presented the lost bill at the bank and demanded payment. It was in vain that they mentioned to this person the transaction by which that bill was annulled; he would not listen to it. He maintained that it had come to him from abroad, and insisted upon immediate payment. The note was payable to bearer, and the £30,000 were paid him. The heirs of the director would not listen to any demands of restitution, and the bank was obliged to sustain the loss. It was discovered afterward that an architect, having purchased the director's house, had taken it down in order to build another upon the same spot, had found the note in the crevice of the chimney, and made his discovery an engine for robbing the bank."

A Sympathetic Man.

The proprietor of one of the great restaurants in Paris was sighing and lamenting at the door of his establishment. Some habitues, as they were going out, asked him what was the matter. "Ah! Messieurs, four persons have just gone away without paying for a sumptuous dinner which they have eaten." "That is unfortunate, but you need not dispair so violently." "Ah!" replied the restaurant-keeper, in a tone of distress, "it is not on my own account. I am rich. But my waiter, Messieurs—my private-room waiter—the father of a family, who has nothing but his place to live on! He will have to bear the loss, and not I!" And he sank down on a chair and melted into tears.

A MANIAC'S DEED.

He Murders his Mother, Sister and Stepfather, Clubbing them to Death with a Shot-Gun—He Completes his Work by Hanging Himself —a Horrible Scene.

LYNDONVILLE, Vt., October 19.—Byron Blake murdered his mother, sister and stepfather with a knife and then hanged himself, in Wheelock, this forenoon. He is thought to have been insane. The murder occurred in the town of Sheffield, Vt., a mile from Wheelock Hollow. The murderer, Byron Blake, was twenty-six years of age. He had, some six years ago, a spinal difficulty, which occasioned the loss of his reason. He was confined in an asylum two years, and, when he returned home, he was considered safe, but was of an ugly temper, as in fact he always had been. His mother was sixty-three years and his stepfather seventy-four years. A school teacher who lives at the house left there for her school at 9 o'clock this morning. A neighbor, Mr. Ingalls, went to the house at 10 o'clock, and, on opening the kitchen door, the ghastly remains of the maniac's victims met his horrified gaze. The body of Mrs Williams lay with her feet near the door that he opened. That of Mr. Parks lay near the sitting-room door, and Mrs. Parks' body lay by the door leading to the sink-room, near the sink, where she had apparently been washing dishes. Blake clubbed them all to death with a shot-gun, breaking the stock off on Mrs. Williams' head, the lock of the gun being found tangled in her hair; the stock lay by her side. The wall, curtains and mirror were bespattered with blood, and there is a hole in the plastering of the ceiling made by an up-stroke of the weapon. Dried apples from hanging racks were scattered about the room. A part of Mrs. Williams' hair was pulled out, and it is supposed she started to escape and that he caught her by the hair and dragged her back. Though an extraordinarily strong woman, she was no match for an armed maniac. The old folks, being feeble, could make little resistance. The back of Mrs. Williams' head was pounded in, her teeth knocked out and her skull broken in over the right eye, and her lips cut open. Mr. Parks' head was terribly pounded, one arm broken and probably his neck broken. Mrs. Parks' head was crushed in the same as the others. The dead body of Blake was found in the barn, suspended by the neck with a rein taken from some harness. Mr. and Mrs. Williams had intended to go to Providence to-day to visit a brother of Mrs. Williams, but postponed it to Thursday. Mr. Williams started this morning for Lyndonville about eight o'clock to see about the tickets. A messenger was dispatched at once and found him at Lydon Corner, one mile south of Lydonville. A week ago to-day a party of some fifty visited Mr. and Mrs. Williams to celebrate the fifteenth anniversary of their wedding. Mr. Parks married Mrs. Blake thirteen years ago, and they were much respected people. Blake was short thick-set, and weighed about 150 pounds. Mr. Williams is a very quiet industrious man. He is completely used up. The whole town is in excitement. There has been no such excitement here since four years ago, when Wilder killed his father and mother and then himself, two miles south of here. Williams had no children. Wheelock is about five miles from here.

The Secret.

"I noticed," said Dr. Franklin, "a mechanic, among others, at work on a house, erecting but a little way from my office, who always appeared to be in a merry humor; who had a kind word and cheerful smile for every one he met. Let the day be ever so cold, gloomy or sunless, a happy smile danced like a sunbeam on his cheerful countenance. Meeting him, one morning, I ask him to tell me the secret of his happy flow of spirits.

"My secret, doctor," he replied, "is that I have got one of the best wives and when I go to work she always has a kind word of encouragement for me, and when I go home she meets me with a smile and a kiss, and then tea is sure to be ready, and she has done so many little things through the day to please me, that I can not find it in my heart to speak an unkind word to anybody."

What an influence, then, hath woman over the heart of man, to soften it and make it the fountain of cheerful and pure emotions! Speak gently, then; a happy smile and a kind word of greeting, after the toils of the day are over, cost nothing, and go far toward making home happy and peaceful.

Royal Gifts of the Soul.

A poetical writer has said that some men move through life as a band of music moves down the street, flinging out pleasure on every side through the air to every one, far and near, that can listen. Some men fill the air with their strength and sweetness, as the orchard, in October days, fill the air with ripe fruit. Some women cling to their own houses like the honeysuckle over the door, yet, like it, fill the region with the subtle fragrance of their goodness. How great a bounty and blessing is it to hold the royal gifts of the soul that they shall be music to some, fragrance to others, and life to all.

The Wife.

When prospects are clouded by the dark shadows of anguish, and the world seems, in a moment of wretched forgetfulness, like a barren desert, what bliss in the thought that there is one being who will sympathize with our sorrow, and cheer us with the tenderest affections. When those set up as idols in the temple of friendship and esteem shall basely desert the post of honor and integrity, is it not happiness to have one who looks fondly as ever on our fortune, and loves with a purity and warmth unknown to the most sacred friendship?

Shall We Meet Again?

The following is one of the most brilliant paragraphs ever written by the lamented George D. Prentice: "The fiat of death is inexorable. There is no appeal for relief from the great law which dooms us to dust. We flourish and fade as the leaves of the forest, and the flowers that bloom, wither and fade in a day have no frailer hold upon life than the mightiest monarch that ever shook the earth with his footsteps. Generations of men will appear and disappear as the grass, and the multitude that throng the world to-day will disappear as footsteps on the shore. Men seldom think of the great event of death until the shadow falls across their own pathway, hiding from their eyes the faces of loved ones whose living smile was the sunlight of their existence. Death is the antagonist of life, and the thought of the tomb is the skeleton of all feasts. We do not want to go through the dark valley, although the dark passage may lead to paradise; we do not want to go down into damp graves, even with princes for bed-fellows. In the beautiful drama of 'Ion' the hope of immortality, so eloquently uttered by the death devoted Greek, finds deep response in every thoughtful soul. When about to yield his life a sacrifice to fate, his Clemanthe asks if they should meet again, to which he responds. I have asked that dreadful question of the hills that look eternal—of the clear streams that flow forever—of stars among whose fields of azure my raised spirits have walked in glory. All are dumb. But, as I gaze upon thy living face, I feel that there is something in love that mantles through its beauty that cannot wholly perish. We shall meet again, Clemanthe."

A Popular and Reliable Company.

As to the soundness and standing of the Ohio Farmers' Insurance Company, the Indiana Farmer has the following editorial in the issue of May 22, 1880:

"Some of the foreign insurance companies are waging a war on the Ohio Farmers' Fire Insurance Company in this state, and report all manner of things about it. We had occasion to examine its reports and papers on file in the office of the Auditor of State this week, as well as those of other companies, and we found its affairs were frankly and freely open to the world, and that its condition compares favorably with other companies. We examined them with a view of ascertaining how much truth there was in statements of other and interested companies, and we believe that the company is sound, and does business safely. The fact that for 32 years it has promptly paid all losses, and accumulated nearly a million of capital besides, is a bit of practical experience in its favor that cannot be whistled down at a breath. It seems that the cause of the war and jealously is, that this company has become very popular among the farmers of the west, and taking no city or conflagration risks, can and does issue policies for less than the rates of some other companies."

The principal office of the company above named is located at Le Roy, Medina county, Ohio. Mr. C. G. Sheppard is the soliciting agent for DeKalb county, Indiana and Defiance county, Ohio. For full particulars concerning the company, address F. M. Thompson, general agent, Hicksville, O.24-tf

ALICE CAREY'S SWEETEST POEM.

Among the beautiful pictures
That hang on memory's wall
Is one of the dim old forest,
That seemeth the best of all;
Not for its gnarled oaks olden,
Dark with the mistletoe;
Not for the violets golden
That sparkle the vale below;
Not for the milk-white lillies
That lean from the fragrant hedge;
Not for the vines on the upland,
Where the bright red berries rest;
Nor the pink, nor the pale, sweet cowslips,
It seems to me the best.

I once had a little brother
With eyes that were dark and deep—
In the lap of that olden forest
He lieth in peace asleep.
Light as the down of the thistle,
Free as the wind that blows,
We roved there the beautiful summers—
The summers of long ago.
But his little feet on the hills grew weary,
And one of the autumn days
I made for my little brother
A bed of the yellow leaves.

Sweetly his pale ar me folded
My neck in sweet embrace,
As the light of immortal beauty
Silently covered his face;
And when the arrows of sunset
Lodged in the tree-tops bright,
He fell, in his saint like beauty,
Asleep by the gates of light.
Therefore, of all the pictures,
That hang on memory's wall,
The one of the dim old forest
Seemeth the best of all.

Lydia Maria Child.

Mrs. Lydia Maria Child, who died a fortnight ago, was one of the most justly distinguished of American women, although her name had become somewhat unfamiliar to the readers of to-day. Her various works were the expressions of her deep and strong interest in the chief concerns of life, and of her ardent but wise sympathy with her kind They ranged from the frugal housewife and mother's book to the progress of religious ideas, and all bore the mark of her clear womanly sagacity, and her instinctive fidelity to liberty —a fidelity which made her firm and uncompromising, yet without asperity or dryness, and which was as serene and beautiful at seventy-eight as it was at twenty-eight. Her earlier tales and the juvenile miscellany—that delightful forerunner and exemplar of children's papers and magazines—gave her a distinction as a "literary woman," which, with her bright and gay humor and grace of intelligence, won for her great social favor. But many a door, even in Boston, which had gladly opened to the young authoress who wrote of the tragedies and sorrows of "early times," was closed to the young woman who in the dawn of the anti-slavery struggle wrote the fervent and eloquent appeal for that class of Americans called Africans.

This work identified Mrs. Child with the early abolitionists, and to the day of emancipation the cause had no more constant and efficient champion. For some time she edited the Anti-slavery Standard, with her husband, the duties, in consequence of his ill health, falling mainly upon her. Her literary activity was unabated, and the freshness and sparkle of her mind, and her shrewd good sense, with simple ardor of feeling, make all her pages charming. In 1859 a letter of sympathy to John Brown led to a correspondence with Governor Wise and Mrs. Mason, of Virginia, in which her part was that of the true woman and American that she was. After the war The Freedman's Book, a manuel of reading for the freedmen, showed her unfading interest in the welfare of the race for which she had so early pleaded.

Her works, as we have said, were but signs of her great intellectual activity, her humane intelligence and sympathy. They indicate, also, the singular purity and independence of her character. Her life was absolutely simple and unostentatious, and the singular sweetness and childlikeness of her nature remained unchanged to the end. She did not seem to grow old, and her interests in current affairs were alert and unfailing. Her life was as secluded and solitary as it was simple, and no friendly entreaty could long draw her from her accustomed haunts. Her husband, David Lee Child, whom she tenderly loved and respected, died a few years since, and she had no children. But her strong and steady mind did not falter. At seventy-eight she was the same unselfish, uncomplaining, sympathetic, shrewd and wise woman the most charming of companions and correspondents, the friend of the friendless, and beloved by the best. It was said of her mother that "she had a simple loving heart, and a spirit busy in doing good." It was true of the daughter; and with the loving heart and beneficient spirit she had the sound mind, the serene heroism, and the charming gifts which make up the woman whom the poet describes as "bright
With something of celestial light."

Proper Education of Girls.

We hear, frequently, of the fact that women are not given the same chances to earn a livelihood as men, and that women do not receive for the same work the same compensation that men receive. Hearing, we say, these complaints so frequently made, set us to thinking deeply upon the subject. We believe there was some reason, and a good one, for this state of affairs, and our solution of the problem we wish briefly to offer for the consideration of our readers. We believe the trouble lies, in a great measure, in the fact that girls are not taught, as boys are, that they must rely upon their own exertions for support and the comforts of life; and, therefore, they do not prepare themselves property for a successful competition with men in the different pursuits of business life. The fault lies, principally, with the parents. You instill into the minds of your girls, both by the manner of their education in the school-room and by your home teachings, the very strongest principles of independence. On the other hand, you do all in your power to teach your boys self-reliance and a manly independence. You say to them, learn while you are boys to take care of yourselves when you become men. It is neither fair nor right to make this distinction; give your girls the same chance that you do your boys; teach them, too, self-reliance while young. Give them not only a good, but a useful education, with a view of supporting themselves, even if they are never called on to put it in practice. One would not abolish the carrying of life-preservers on our steamers merely from the fact that they are seldom used. Women do not succeed in business so well as men, for the simple reason that they are not, by their early teachings, so well fitted for it. When women fit themselves for, and do the same work as men, they will be able to obtain employment as readily as men obtain it, and will receive as high a compensation for the work done. Let the parent, then, when he gives his boy a business education, do as much in justice for his girl. The ladies' department of our college has much increased of late, in size. We think it is a good sign, and hope that parents will reflect on what we have said, and send us their girls, to be prepared for the different duties of business life; then should misfortune deprive them of other supports, they will be able, by their own exertions, to earn an honorable and comfortable living.—Heald's College Journal.

Louisiana Oranges.

[New Orleans Democrat.]

There are not many persons who appreciate the extent of our orange trade, or who realize what an enormous source of revenue the culture of this delicious fruit may be made. On the twenty-sixth of this month there were shipped from here on the Chicago, St. Louis and New Orleans railroad, eleven car loads of oranges, destined to Denver, St. Louis, Cincinnati, Chicago and Evansville. There were in this shipment 1,320 barrels, and averaging the barrel at 300, we have a total of 396,000 oranges sent in one day by one railway to supply the increasing demand in the west for Louisiana's juicy and luscious fruit which is far superior to the oranges of Cuba, and even the much-vaunted fruit of Florida.

Between the 1st of October and the 26 there was shipped by the same road to the western cities 21,000 barrels, an aggregate of 6,300,000 oranges. The demand for this healthful and universally favorite fruit is such that it can never be fully supplied, so that there is every inducement for our people to go largely into orange culture, which, when pursued with intelligence, will yield a much larger return for the capital invested than either cotton or sugar. The orange crop of Florida will assume enormous proportions. Owing to judicious advertising, it became the fashion for northern people to go to Florida for their health, and they, seeing what a mine of wealth was in the culture of oranges in that state, invested largely in groves, which are now rapidly bearing and from which are supplied almost exclusively the cities of the north and east. The state is becoming a vast orange grove, and millions of dollars of northern capital are invested there in orange farms. The Louisiana orange as we have said, is finer than either the Florida or Cuban orange, and our climate is peculiarly favorable to the growth of the trees, hence we should either ourselves increase our production of the fruit or else invite western and northern capital here to plant new groves, and make Louisiana what she should be—the rival of Florida. If that state supplies the north and east with oranges, Louisiana should certainly be equal to supplying the west and northwest.

Woman's Strength.

The strength of women lies in their heart. It shows itself in their strong love and instinctive perception of right and wrong. Intellectual courage is rarely one of their virtues. As a rule, they are inclined to be restless and excitable, allowing their judgment and actions to be swayed by quick emotions of all kinds; but, above all, it is in their hopefulness and their endurance that they find their chief power. Who is the last person to give up hope in the case of a member of the family who has, apparently, gone altogether to the bad? What mother or sister, with deep and ardent love for such, will ever cease to cherish hope or endure suffering on their account? The patience of woman is proverbial, and their whole lives are bound up in their affections. Few people will deny that love, in one form or another, makes up the beauty of life to women. It enters into all she does. Any work outside her immediate circle is undertaken, often, from a pure desire to help some one else to know something of the mysterious happiness of love. Unlike men, women chiefly look for personal intercourse with those for whom they are working. If their interest lies among the poor, they are desirous of sympathetic personal acquaintance with them, and very little work of a lasting kind has been done by women without their own influence of love being brought to bear on the individual case. —[Nineteenth Century.

Influence of Females.

It is better for you to pass an evening once or twice a week in a lady's drawing-room, even though the conversation is slow, and you know the girl's song by heart, than in a club, or tavern, or the pit of a theater. All amusement of youth to which virtuous women are not admitted, rely on it, are deleterious in their nature. All men who avoid female society have dull perceptions and are stupid, or have gross tastes, and revolt against what is pure. Your club swaggerers, who are sucking the butts of billiard-cues all night, call female society insipid. Poetry is uninspiring to a yokel; beauty has no charms for a blind man; music does not please a poor beast that does not know one tune from another, but as a true epicure is hardly ever tired of water, sancey, and brown bread and butter, I protest I can sit for a whole night talking with a well-regulated, kindly woman about her girl, Fanny, or her boy, Frank, and like the evening's entertainment. One of the benefits a man may derive from woman's society is, that he is bound to be respectful to her. The habit is of great good to your moral men depend, upon it. Our education makes of us the most eminently selfish men in the world. We fight for ourselves; we yearn for ourselves; we push for ourselves; we light our pipes and say we will not go out; we prefer ourselves and our ease, and the greatest good that comes to man from woman's society is, that he has to think of somebody to whom he is bound to be constantly attentive and respectful.

Actresses' Arts.

[New York Mirror.]

A great many tricks of stage costumes spring from personal defects. In whatever cut of waist Modjeska appears, there is always a bunch of flowers or a bow placed at the left of her open corsage. When this device is not resorted to, a little strap of silk will be trailed across diagonally, or a little fan of lace will suddenly spring from the left corner, in order to hide a scar on the breast that looks as if it might be the result of a wound from a poniard, a "souvenir" of a romance.

Poor Lucille Western was afflicted by a birth-mark. She was a regular female Esau. About her waist was a thick growth of silky brown hair, which ran up to a point in front. Where it came above the top of her dresses it was carefully shaved, but the skin always remained blue. So Lucille wore a huge cross dangling just above that portion of her anatomy.

Parepa Rosa had a deep vaccination scar far down her robust arm, and when her sleeves were very short a knot of ribbon or a trail of flowers used to cover it. Before she became so extremely stout, she wore a golden band above the elbow to hide it, but when her armlet had to be as big as a waistcoat she abandoned the odity. One night, speaking of the scar to an American girl who sat in her dressing room, the Yankee offered Parepa an immediate and effectual concealment of the offending spot. She took one of the candles off the toilet table, and, holding it above the arm, let one drop of the melted wax fall upon the place, and there was no further need of concealing devices. A dash of flesh-tinted powder completed the cure, and Parepa's make-up box forever after contained a bit of wax candle.

Mrs. Abraham Lincoln.

[Philadelphia Record New York Letter.]

Truth is stranger than fiction anyhow, and the few who saw the widow of Abraham Lincoln thrust rudely back by policemen at the steamship wharf on Wednesday could not be sure of that fact. An aged, white-haired woman, almost shabbily clad, she attracted no attention from the throng who crowded about to welcome the French adventurers. The latter were mainly foreigners, and were of no social prominence, but somebody ought to have looked after Mrs. Lincoln, and nobody did. Hers has been a sad life. From the pinnacle of social prominence she had decended to the depths of forgetfulness. A little of the money squandered by the republicans of this state on Grant would go far to make Mrs. Lincoln comfortable for life.

Among Ancient Ruins.

In June of last year Professor P. Cavadias went to Tegea for the purpose of making preparatory excavations for the discovery of the temple of Minerva Alea. While there, he found that in the villages situated in the ancient territory of Tegea were many remarkable antiquities, and conceived the idea of uniting these things and forming a small museum on the spot, not only to preserve them from destruction, but also to facilitate the studies of archæologists. In one of these villages, called Asuria, he found some bas-reliefs thrown about the streets; others in the dark and damp cellar of an eating-house; and a large bas-relief, representing the body of Hector dragged round the walls of Troy, lay on the floor of the village church, and was almost destroyed by the feet of the worshipers. Altogether this little museum contains twenty-four statues and bas-reliefs. Some of the marbles are of great value, being the work of Scopas and his pupils.

Henry Ward Beecher and Bob Ingersoll.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

At a recent republican meeting in New York, Henry Ward Beecher presided and made a speech, followed by Bob Ingersoll. Think of it! Reflect upon it! Beecher and Ingersoll shaking hands over the grave of American liberties! Ingersoll, the blasphemous wretch who insults God openly, and Beecher, the lecherous old scoundrel, the victim of whose lust is praying for death to relieve her of the burden of her woes. This man Beecher, this teacher of Plymouth gospel; this representative of lust; this libidinous, lascivious, prurient, lecherous, rampart and carnal old villian, presiding at a republican meeting, and teaching young Americans their duty. Alas! From the day that Satan beguiled Eve there has not been such an exhibition of infamy, and yet the republican party accepts Beecher as a presiding officer and cheers him to the echo, and when he is done, calls upon Bob Ingersoll. Beecher and Ingersoll—twin monstrosities, children of hell, characters representatives of Sodom, when Jehovah rained fire and brimstone upon it—speak to republicans, and tell young Americans their duty. No wonder that Jehovah decides to continue the curse of republicanism upon the country. A people that will tolerate Beecherism and Ingersollism deserves to be punished. The republican party professes to be the God and morality party, and Beecher and Ingersoll are its chosen representatives.

Mr. Hughes' Colony.

The London News moralizes as follows on Thomas Hughes' Tennessee colony: "By degrees the colonists may amalgamate with their neighbors and thus lose any special individuality that they possess. Much counsel has been given them to the effect that they should do so. But these things have a tendency to settle themselves in a manner not bearing any very special reference to the way in which they may be artificially arranged beforehand. Probably its members may in time take to spelling traveler with one 'l,' to prefer iced water to beer and claret, to rowing without coxswains, and expecting to find a hair-dresser's shop in a hotel. That is to say, they would gradually cease to be Englishmen and become Americans. There is no need to appraise here their consequent loss or gain. But this isle of ours is tolerably used to send off from her shores such swarms, some of whom return and some do not. We shall not begrudge the Americans a contribution of somewhat better material than that which our steamers are in the habit of landing on their shores. The one thing which every Englishman must learn is, that he has to make his own way in the world, and to make it where he can find his opening, without trusting to parliament, or to Providence, or to the chapter of accidents, to see him through bad times, and succor him in good ones."

A DINNER AND A KISS.

"I have brought your dinner, father,"
The blacksmith's daughter said,
As she took from her arms a kettle
And lifted its shining lid.
"There is not any pie or pudding,
So I will give you this,"
And upon his toil-worn forehead

The blacksmith took off his apron
And dined in happy mood,
Wondering much at the savor
Hid in his humble food.
While about him were visions
Full of prophetic bliss;
But he never thought of magic
In his little daughter's kiss.

While she with her kettle swinging
Merrily trudged away,
Stopping at sight of a squirrel,
Catching some wild bird's lay.

And I thought how many a shadow
Of life and fate we would miss,
If always our frugal dinners
Were seasoned with a kiss.

A Curious Petition.

This was addressed to the governor of South Carolina in the year 1733, by sixteen maidens of Charleston. It ran thus: "The humble petition of all the maids whose names are underwritten. Whereas, we, the humble petitioners, are at present in a very melancholy state of mind, considering how all the bachelors are blindly captivated by widows, and our own youthful chances thereby neglected; in consequence of this, our request is, that your excellency will, for the future, order that no widows presume to marry any young man until the maids are provided for; or else to pay each of them a fine for satisfaction for invading our liberties; and likewise a fine to be levied on all such bachelors as shall be married to widows. The great disadvantage it is to us maids is, that the widows, by their forward carriage, do snap up the young men, and have the vanity to think their merit beyond ours, which is a great imposition on us, who ought to have the preference. This is humbly recommended to your excellency's consideration, and hope you will permit no further insults. And we poor maids, in duty bound, will ever pray." The maidens all forlorn would have much improved the edict of the Portuguese king which forbade widows more than fifty years old from remarrying, on the ground that widows of that age commonly wedded young men of no property, who dissipated the fortunes which such marriages brought them to the prejudice of children and other relatives.

A Voiceless Wife.

Burdette leaves off his fun to write this pretty little sketch: "While I was lecturing at Washington, I saw a lady with an intelligent, pretty face and bright, eloquent eyes that were rarely lifted toward the speaker, and then only for a flash of time. They were bent upon her husband's hands almost constantly. Brilliant and accomplished a few years ago, she had gone down into the world of voiceless silence, and now all the music and all the speech that comes into her life, comes through the tender devotion of her husband; and as I talked I watched him telling off the lecture on his nimble fingers, while her eager eyes glanced from them to his sympathetic face. It was a pretty picture of devotion. They were so young to have this cloud shadow the morning skies of their lives; but as I glanced from the voiceless wife to her husband I thougut how beautifully the sunlight of his devotion was breaking through these clouds and tinting even their afflictions with a tender radiance. This discipline of attending upon the suffering is a good thing for man. It rounds out his life; it develops manlier, nobler qualities; it makes his heart brave and tender and strong as a woman's."

The half-trained young women who teach for pin-money in the public schools may perhaps be interested in reading the London Spectator's summary of the business of a skilled schoolmaster: "To know by what devices knowledge may be most effectually presented to the mind of a beginner; to know how to kindle interest and enthusiasm in a new study, when to appeal to the judgment and when to the memory, how to put wise questions, how to arrange and correlate different studies, and what are their respective values as instruments of mental development, how to test the results of work, what is the right mode of discipline, and how rewards and punishments can be most judiciously used."

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

THE examination of Kenward Philp on a charge of concocting the Morey letter was resumed at New York on the 29th ult. The opening feature of the day was the surrender of the envelope by Hart, the publisher of Truth, to Judge Davis, when testimony by experts in handwriting was listened to. Albert Southworth and William E. Hagan, experts, testified that the writing of the letter was similar to the acknowledged writing of Philp. Mr. Leet, a newspaper reporter, also testified that the letter was in Philp's handwriting. A number of postoffice employes, including Mr. Pearson, Assistant Postmaster at New York, testified that the postmarks on the envelope were not genuine.

ON the third day of the trial of Kenward Philp, at New York, Postmaster Ainger, of Washington, and one of his stamping clerks testified that the postmark on the Morey letter did not come into use until Feb. 18 of this year, and therefore that the envelope could not have been mailed in January. The prosecution also presented three or four witnesses who claimed to be familiar with Philp's handwriting, and who swore to their belief that he wrote the Morey letter. To offset this testimony the defense introduced ten witnesses, all attaches of different newspapers with which Philp had been connected, and all of them were perfectly positive that the Morey letter and the address were not in Philp's handwriting. The young man, James McDermott, one of the State's witnesses, was given an exceedingly bad character by eight of these associates of Philp, who united in saying that they wouldn't believe him under oath.

NEW BRIGHTON, on Long island, has been the scene of a shocking street-car accident. A car was proceeding down hill, the brakes failed to act, and the car, which was filled with passengers, mostly women, was impelled along with rapidly-increasing velocity until it reached a sharp turn, where it jumped the track, struck against a post, and was utterly demolished. Five women were very badly injured by the accident, and eight women and an infant slightly hurt.

IN the Philp trial at New York, on the 1st inst., the prosecution introduced the Postmaster of Lynn, Mass., who testified that no such person as H. L. Morey ever lived in Lynn, and that no such an organization as the Employers' Union ever existed there. Hon. Abram S. Hewitt, for the defense, testified that in his opinion the Morey letter was in Gen. Garfield's handwriting. Philp then took the stand and swore that he did not write the letter. S. L. Morey, of Lawrence, Mass., was introduced as a witness and testified to the existence of such a man as H. L. Morey, who, he said, was his uncle, and that he had lived at Lynn and other places in Massachusetts. The witness also swore that he had been offered $100 not to come to New York and testify in the case. The examination was then adjourned to Thursday, Nov. 4.

THE trial of Philp, charged with forging the Morey letter, was resumed at New York on the 4th inst., and Hart, the publisher of Truth, testified that the letter came to him through the mail, and that Philp never saw it until it appeared in facsimile. Hart had doubts at first about its genuineness, but after subjecting it to a microscopic examination and consulting with Chairman Barnum he concluded to publish it.

THE WEST.

THE Chicago Tribune says a careful recapitulation of the ravages of the great storm of Oct. 16 on the lakes shows that upward of $500,000 damage was done to vessels and cargoes, and that ninety-three persons perished. There were seventeen total wrecks, involving a loss of $158,900, and in all sixty-six vessels were damaged to a greater or less extent.

THE police of Minneapolis have captured a woman who for eighteen months has worn male attire and represented herself as a nephew of August Belmont, of New York, while engaged in studying medicine and making matrimonial engagements.... By the collision of two passenger trains on the Panhandle railroad, near Steubenville, Ohio, James Cunningham, Michael Cunningham and Thomas Langan, who were in the baggage-car of one of the trains, and Thomas Atkinson, one of the firemen, were killed. None of the passengers were injured.

A REPUBLICAN meeting in St. Louis just before the election, in which Republican clubs participated largely, wound up in a desperate riot, in which a negro named Brown was killed and several other persons were seriously wounded. It required nearly the whole police force of the city to quell the emeute.... The Chinese issue led to a serious riot in Denver. A raid was made on the Celestials at noon on Sunday, the last day of October, many of their houses were torn down, and one occupant killed with bricks. The police were powerless, and in an effort by the firemen to quell the rioters two of the former were badly wounded. One Chinaman was put in jail for safety, and the mob yelled: "Lynch the leper!" At dark the rioters gutted Chinese houses at will, one Celestial having suffered the loss of his queue. Three hundred special policemen were sworn in and the fire department held in readiness to meet the torch of the incendiary. Denver has a Chinese population of about 180, and no instances are mentioned where they undertook to defend themselves.... The workingmen of Omaha had quite a commotion over a false report that the water-works for that city were to built by Chinese brought from the Pacific coast. The labor union ordered arms and ammunition and laid the city off in fighting districts to await the advent of the Celestials.... The great storm of Oct. 16, 1880, will remain memorable in the annals of lake navigation because of its violence and the destruction of property on the lakes, more particularly on Lake Michigan, caused by it. The Chicago Tribune prints a resume of the damage inflicted on the lakes by the great blow, from which it appears that ninety-three lives were lost, fifty-five vessels stranded, eleven dismasted or water-logged, and seventeen totally wrecked.

THE number of hogs packed at Chicago during the year ending Nov. 1 was 5,500,000.... A melancholy reminder of the lost steamer Alpena floated ashore near Grand Haven, the other day. It was recognized as the body of a deck hand named Jack.... Geissler, a Chicago Supervisor of Election, who was arrested by a policeman while in the discharge of his duties, was ordered released by Judge Drummond, who held that Federal laws and officers were superior to all State or municipal laws, and that Marshals and Supervisors could not be arrested by city officers while properly discharging their duties.... A Panhandle cattle train was thrown off an embankment near Steubenville, Ohio. Three men were injured and 400 head of cattle killed.

AFTER a remarkably successful tour of Australia, England, Ireland, Scotland and Wales, where "Otto" was performed in all 1,000 times, Mr. and Mrs. George S. Knight have returned to their native country, to gather the reward of excellence and enterprise in the form of an increased popularity. Their engagements in New York and elsewhere since their return are reported to have been the most remunerative they have ever played. Mr. and Mrs. Knight are in Chicago the present week, at McVicker's magnificent theater, and the people of Chicago feel toward him somewhat as though he were a product of that city, so much has Chicago been the scene of his struggles and successes.

CAPT. PARDEE, of the Thirty-third Infantry, is at Wichita, Kan. He has a force of fifty-two soldiers and twenty-five Indian scouts with which to repel Payne's next invasion of Oklahoma.... The fourth floor of an extensive malt-house on the Bloomingdale road, in the northwest quarter of Chicago, gave way, precipitating the other floors to the ground. There were forty-five men at work in the building, of whom one was killed and several injured.

TWO BRICK buildings comprising the Construction Department and containing the machinery and bullet presses of the United States Arsenal at Benicia, Cal., have been destroyed by fire. The loss is estimated at $200,000.

A PIG, won on an election bet at South Bend, Ind., was turned over to the Republican Central Committee, and sold at auction for the benefit of the poor, realizing $246.

THE SOUTH.

A BRUTAL murder for money in Georgia has led to the unraveling of a mysterious tragedy occurring two years ago. Tom Betts, a negro, killed Judge H. J. Moore with a maul, and, on being arrested, confessed that he was the murderer of James Defour and wife, of which crime an innocent man is under conviction.

COLLECTOR CLARK, under date of Atlanta, Ga., telegraphs to Washington: "Have seized within thirty days thirty illicit distilleries, two teams and about 1,000 gallons of illicit spirits. Nine of the distilleries were in the notorious Red Oak neighborhood. As soon as the stills are torn out in that section others are at once set up, and the illicit work resumed."....The town of Bayou Sara, La., has been almost swept out of existence by fire. The loss is estimated at $300,000.

EIGHT tramps attacked J. P. Brown and a friend in a tunnel near Gallatin, Tenn. Brown killed two of his assailants, when the others rallied and beat him nearly to death, robbing him of $1,200....At Johnson's, in South Carolina, on election day, some negroes tried to seize a ballot box, and one colored man was killed and three wounded in the riot which followed.

THE Mississippi river steamer Robert Mitchell was sunk, at Fox island, with a cargo of cotton and breadstuffs. The Arkansas river packet Ouachita Belle sunk near Austin, Miss., with cotton and general freight.

POLITICAL.

THE vote cast in Philadelphia was something enormous: For Garfield, 96,794; for Hancock, 76,067; total, 172,861....Nebraska Republicans have already mentioned ex-Senator Hitchcock for the Secretaryship of the Interior. He was a classmate of the new President at Williams College.

WASHINGTON.

THE United States currency outstanding on the 1st inst. amounted to $362,622,835. ....The President has set apart Thursday, Nov. 25, as a day of national thanksgiving. Following is the official proclamation:

At no period in their history since the United States became a nation has this people had so abundant and so universal reasons for joy and gratitude at the favor of Almighty God, or been subject to so profound an obligation to give thanks for His loving kindness and humbly to implore His continued care and protection. Health, wealth and prosperity throughout all our borders; peace, honor and friendship with all the world; firm and faithful adherence by the great body of our population to the principles of liberty and justice which have made our greatness as a nation, and to the wise institutions and strong frame of government and society which will perpetuate it—for all these let the thanks of a happy and united people, as with one voice, ascend in devout homage to the Giver of all good.

I therefore recommend that, on Thursday, the 25th day of November next, the people meet in their respective places of worship to make the acknowledgment to Almighty God for His bounties and His protection, and to offer to Him prayer for their continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this first day of November, in the year of our Lord one thousand eight hundred and eighty, and of the independence of the United States the hundred and fifth.

R. B. HAYES.

SECRETARY EVARTS has received intelligence from Minister Christiancy that the latter's efforts to bring about peace between Chili and Peru have not been productive of good results so far. GENERAL.

CASUALTIES: The rotary bleacher and boiler at Hinsdale, N. H., burst; one man was killed and several injured. A Eureka (Cal.) dispatch says the schooner Edward Parke capsized on Humboldt bar; a sailor named Christiansen and Robert Williams, a passenger, were drowned. Two persons were killed and several injured by the explosion of a boiler in the mill of Jasper Smith, at Guntersville, Tenn.

KATE SPRAGUE has made overtures for an amicable divorce....Ulysses S. Grant, Jr., second son of the ex-President, was married to Miss Fannie J. Chaffee, only child of ex-Senator Jerome B. Chaffee, of Colorado, at New York, last week.

IT is said that the forthcoming annual report of Gen. Sherman will be his last, as he has determined to carry into effect an intention frequently expressed to go upon the retired list next spring, having served the thirty years required by section 1,243 of the Revised Statutes to qualify him for voluntary retirement. The title of General is exclusively his own, and his retirement will not make a vacancy on the active list. It will, however, take Lieut. Gen. Sheridan to Washington as commander of the army, and will open the way for Maj. Gen. Hancock's transfer to Chicago as commander of the great and important military division embracing nearly the whole theater of Indian operations and the greater part of the active forces of the army.

THE Captain of the American steam launch Isabel reports being subjected to gross outrages by Chilian sailors at the port of Payta, the American flag being pulled down and trampled on....American breadstuffs have advanced about 100 per cent. at St. Petersburg, and the supply fails to meet the demand.... Several new signal stations are to be established on the lakes.

FOREIGN.

DISPATCHES from Capetown, South Africa, say: "Mr. Hope, magistrate at Quobo, has been treacherously murdered, many of Chief Umbiohlo's people witnessing the crime. The tribe is now in open rebellion. It is reported that Mr. Welsh, magistrate at Tiolo, has been murdered. There have been several minor engagements in which the colonists were successful. The Government has called out 3,000 more colonial troops."

A LONDON dispatch says the gravity of the situation in Ireland occupies English attention almost to the exclusion of the foreign and colonial difficulties. The reports during the week from Dublin conflict alike respecting the prosecution of the Land-League leaders and the policy of the Irish executive touching the whole question. The latest accounts say the Government intends to indict only six of the leading agitators, Mr. Parnell included. Growing impatience is manifested by the Irish landlords in regard to what they consider to be hesitation on the part of the Government. This impatience is shared by the English public, who begin to perceive that the agitation is directed not against bad landlords merely, but, so far as it is agrarian and not political, against the principle of ownership in land except by actual occupiers who cultivate the soil. Threatening letters multiply daily. The Land-League leaders continue to deny their responsibility for violence, alleging, perhaps truly, that it is not themselves but the Ribbon lodges which commit murders....A party of Bulgarians threw mud on the coat-of-arms of the French Consulate at Varna, and the French Ambassador ordered a gunboat thither.

A FRIGHTFUL and probably unprecedented balloon accident is reported by cable from Paris. A large crowd had assembled to witness the novel and perilous ascent of a gymnast called Auguste Navarre, who, with inexplicable foolhardiness, had volunteered to perform a number of athletic feats on a trapeze suspended from a balloon. When the balloon had reached a height of 1,000 yards, the crowd was horrified to see the gymnast suddenly let go the bar and fall. The tragic descent was watched in breathless excitement. At last the body reached the ground, striking with such force that it made a hole in the earth two feet deep, and rebounded four yards. It was crushed and mangled almost beyond recognition.... The Basuto war has caused 4,000 more European soldiers to be ordered to the frontier from Cape Town. The Pontamese are also in open rebellion, and the situation is critical....Another terrific hurricane, accompanied by a blinding snow-storm, has passed over Denmark. The railways were blocked, and a score of wrecks are reported.... At the opening stage of the Nihilist trials, Hartmann, now a fugitive in London, sends out the assertion that a terrible fate awaits the Czar....An Athens dispatch says the Porte is sending troops and ammunition to the Greek frontier. Unless the Turks retire to the new frontier war is certain.

PARNELL and Dillon and thirteen other Land-Leaguers have been indicted in Dublin, and will be tried in that city about Christmas.

THE English coasting steamer Elemore, with all hands (fifteen persons), was lost in the recent gale off the eastern coast of England....Now comes the Duchess of Montrose with a winning of £16,000 on a recent horse-race....Nally, one of the indicted Land Leaguers, in a recent speech, advocated the use of dynamite and gun-cotton against landlords.... Both the harvest and the fishery have failed in the lower portion of Quebec, and the sufferers have appealed to the Government for aid.

THIRTEEN men were killed near Brussels, Belgium, by falling through a coal shaft. The accident was caused by the breakage of the hoisting apparatus....Menotti Garibaldi addressed a very large universal suffrage meeting at Milan, Italy....Eighty citizens of Hamburg and twenty families in Altona have been ejected under the German Socialist law. Notices have also been freely served in Schleswig-Holstein.... More agrarian outrages are reported from Ireland. A magistrate of Leinster was fired at from behind a hedge. A man in County Clare who bid for a farm from which the tenants had been evicted suffered the loss of his ears at the hands of a mob....The Turks recently compelled Admiral Smith, on reaching the Dardanelles with the British war-ship Pandora, to await a permit to pass.

THE cradle of the infant Princess of Spain is of polished ebony inlaid with silver; its form is that of an open shell; the curtains are of silver gauze enameled with white velvet flowers; the coverlet of white satin, on which are embroidered in brilliant colors the arms of Spain. One lady grandesse of Spain stands at the foot of the cradle during the royal infant's slumber to watch the precise moment of her awakening; another grandesse stands at the head armed with a huge feather fan to chase away the flies. The royal Spanish crown, which in silver gilt hangs in front of the cradle, is the work of Froment, the great Parisian goldsmith. The cost of the cradle, without the hangings of fine lace and the garniture of marabout feathers which surround it, is estimated at $1,400.

THE NOVEMBER ELECTIONS.

New England.

MAINE.

AUGUSTA, Nov. 3.—The result of the September election was reversed in the Pine Tree State, the Republican majority being between 4,000 and 5,000. The straight Greenback ticket received only about 2,000 votes.

AUGUSTA, Nov. 4.—The returns indicate that the majority for Garfield will reach, if it does not exceed, 5,000.

NEW HAMPSHIRE.

CONCORD, Nov. 3.—New Hampshire elects the Republican electors and State ticket by from 2,000 to 2,500. Three Republican Congressmen are probably elected, although in the First district the vote is close.

CONCORD, Nov. 4.—Garfield's plurality is about 4,000. Hall, Republican, is elected in the First district by over 800 plurality; Briggs, Republican, in the Second, by over 1,600; Farr, Republican, in the Third, by over 800.

VERMONT.

BURLINGTON, Nov. 3.—Vermont slightly increased the majority which she gave the Republican State ticket last September. Returns thus far received indicate that the majority for Garfield may reach 30,000, though 28,000 is probably nearer the truth.

MASSACHUSETTS.

In Massachusetts the Republicans elected a straight Congressional delegation of eleven—a gain of one. The Garfield electoral ticket is elected by about 50,000 majority. Boston complete gives Garfield 25,524 and Hancock 27,659. The defeat of Morse (Congressman) is not conceded by the Democrats.

BOSTON, Nov. 4.—The complete vote, lacking nine towns, is counted, and Garfield's plurality is 57,702, and Gov. Long's 50,854 over Thompson. The Tenth Congressional district is still in doubt, a recount having been ordered in Boston. Morse (Democrat) is probably elected. The Legislature will stand: Senate, 35 Republicans, 5 Democrats; House, 183 Republicans, 42 Democrats, 2 Greenbackers.

RHODE ISLAND.

PROVIDENCE, Nov. 3.—Rhode Island complete gives Garfield 18,188; Hancock, 10,784; scattering, 141. Garfield's majority, 7,263, a Republican gain of 2,291 over the majority for Hayes. Both the Republican Congressmen are elected.

CONNECTICUT.

Returns from all but twenty-two small towns in Connecticut give Garfield 59,372 and Hancock 58,080. These cannot alter the result, and will increase rather than decrease the Republican majority. The Legislature, which selects a United States Senator, is Republican. Republicans elect Buck in the First Congressional district by 1,800, Wait by a large majority in the Third, and Miles by a close vote in the Fourth. The Democrats elect Phelps by 1,500 to 2,000 in the Second district.

HARTFORD, Nov. 4.—The total vote of Connecticut, lacking the small town of Hamden, is 131,913 for President and 131,639 for Governor. Garfield received 66,661; Hancock, 64,043; Weaver, 844, Dow, 345; Garfield's plurality, 2,618. Bigelow, Republican, majority for Governor, 1,138, and his plurality 2,388. The Legislature will stand: Sixteen Republicans to five Democrats in the Senate, and 165 Republicans to eighty-three Democrats, one Independent, and one Greenbacker in the House. The Republican majority on joint ballot is ninety-three.

Middle States.

NEW YORK.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3.—Full returns show the following results in this city and Brooklyn: The total vote for Presidential Electors in New York city is 204,870, and Hancock's majority is 40,938. In Kings county, on a total vote of about 112,000, Hancock has about 10,000 majority. The aggregate majority for Hancock in the two counties is 50,500. The Democrats gain one member of Congress in this city, and one in Brooklyn, by the defeat of Chittenden. The Times places the Republican majority in the State at 25,000, the Tribune at 40,000 and the World at 10,000 to 15,000. The two former papers claim a Republican majority in the new Congress, while the World says the next House will certainly be Democratic by a small majority. Grace's majority for Mayor in this city is 3,000 over Dowd, Republican.

NEW YORK, Nov. 3.—The following is the complete city vote for Presidential electors in this city: Hancock, 123,102; Garfield, 81,726; The New York delegation in the next Congress will have twenty Republicans and thirteen Democrats, a gain of four Democratic Congressmen. The Democratic gains come from the Second Congressional district (Kings county), where Smith, Democrat, takes the place of Chittenden, Republican; the Seventh district, where Dugro, Democrat, succeeds Einstein, Republican; the Fourteenth district, where Beach, Democrat, succeeds Ferdon, Republican; the Sixteenth district, where Nolan, Democrat, succeeds Barley, Republican, and the Thirty-second district, where Scoville, Democrat, succeeds Pierce, Republican. The Democrats lose the Fifteenth district, where Cornell, Republican, succeeds Lounsbury, Democrat, making a net gain of four Congressmen.

NEW JERSEY.

TRENTON, Nov. 3.—The Democratic State Committee claim the State has been carried for Hancock, and for Ludlow for Governor. Republicans claim they have elected five Congressmen out of seven. The delegation will stand the same as last session. The Legislature is in doubt, although the Republicans claim a majority on joint ballot.

TRENTON, Nov. 4.—New Jersey has chosen Hancock electors and a Democratic Governor. Three of the seven Congressmen are Democrats. The majority for Hancock is about 1,500. Ludlow, Democratic candidate for Governor, is elected by about 700 majority. The Senate stands 16 Republicans and 5 Democrats, and the House 33 Republicans and 27 Democrats, a Republican majority on joint ballot of 17.

PENNSYLVANIA.

PHILADELPHIA, Nov. 3.—The Democrats concede Philadelphia to the Republicans by 26,000, and the State by 36,000, and 19 Republican Congressmen, a Democratic loss of one. Legislature, Republicans, 153; Democrats, 93; Greenbackers, 4; Republican majority, 56, a Republican gain of 20 on joint ballot.

DELAWARE.

WILMINGTON, Del., Nov. 3.—Returns received indicate a majority in the State of at least 1,000 for Hancock. The Democrats will secure at least fourteen of the twenty-one legislators, and the probabilities are that their ticket will be unanimously elected.

Southern States.

MARYLAND.

BALTIMORE, Nov. 2.—The total vote of Baltimore city is: Garfield, 23,354; Hancock, 32,677—a Republican gain of 878. Returns from the interior show Republican gains.

VIRGINIA.

RICHMOND, Nov. 2.—Returns indicate the success of the regular Democratic electoral ticket. The election of Dezendorf, Republican, to Congress from the Second district is conceded, a Republican gain of one Congressman.

WEST VIRGINIA.

WHEELING, Nov. 2.—The Democratic majority in the State is estimated at 9,000. All the Congressional districts are Democratic.

SOUTH CAROLINA.

COLUMBIA, Nov. 2.—All business was suspended to-day in the city and county. Whites and blacks were thick at every polling-place. There was no disturbance. Several arrests of negroes trying to repeat were made. Hard work was done on both sides. About 35,000 votes were polled in this city. The Democrats have majorities in all the wards. Returns from the interior indicate the choice of the Hancock electors by a large majority, and the selection of a solid Democratic delegation to Congress.

COLUMBIA, Nov. 3.—It is estimated that South Carolina will give about 50,000 Democratic majority. During election day one negro was killed and thirteen wounded in Edgefield, and one negro killed in Newberry county. There was an attempted riot on the part of negroes in Aiken county, but it was quelled without injury to any one.

NORTH CAROLINA.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., Nov. 2.—Both parties polled a full vote, which exceeds the vote of 1876. Everything quiet.

GEORGIA.

ATLANTA, Nov. 3.—This was the dullest Presidential election ever known in Georgia. The vote was light and there was no enthusiasm in the Democratic ranks. The Republicans came near capturing the First, Second and Fifth districts. In the Seventh the organized Democrats rallied and defeated Felton, Independent, who has had three terms. The negroes voted lightly but solidly for Garfield. Speer, Independent, is re-elected in the Ninth. Hancock's majority will fall 30,000 below Tilden's.

FLORIDA.

JACKSONVILLE, Nov. 3.—Indications favor the election of Bloxham, Democrat, for Governor, and Davidson, Democrat, for Congress in the First district. The Second district is close, but is probably carried by the Democrats. Gains are reported from nearly every place where returns have been received.

JACKSONVILLE, Nov. 3.—Returns come in slowly. No doubt the Democrats have carried the State ticket and both members of Congress.

LOUISIANA.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 2.—The election in this city passed off quietly, with the exception of a difficulty between a white man and a negro at the polls in the Eighth ward, in which the negro was wounded by a pistol shot. Indications point to a light vote here and throughout the State. Returns indicate the election of the Democratic candidates in all the Congressional districts.

NEW ORLEANS, Nov. 3.—Hancock's majority in this city is 10,232. The Democratic majority in the State will probably reach 25,000. Darrall, Republican, is elected to Congress in the Third district—a Republican gain.

ALABAMA.

MOBILE, Nov. 2.—Returns from Alabama indicate the election of all the Democratic Congressmen. The Democratic majority in the State is estimated at 40,000.

MISSISSIPPI.

JACKSON, Nov. 3.—Reports from the First and Fourth districts indicate the election of Muldrow and Singleton (Democrats) by large majorities. Reports from other districts are so meager that no estimate can be made of majorities. All counties report a light vote.

JACKSON, Nov. 3.—Reports from fifty counties, towns and precincts give Hancock 15,238, Garfield 6,882. Returns from the First, Second, Fourth and Fifth Congressional districts indicate the election of Democrats in each by a decided majority. Returns from the Sixth Congressional district are meager and not sufficient to base an estimate, but Chalmers leads as far as heard from. The vote is light throughout the State.

TEXAS.

DALLAS, Nov. 2.—Hancock's majority in Texas over Greenbackers and Republicans will be 80,000. Roberts is running behind the ticket for Governor, though he will be elected by 50,000. The Democrats carry every Congressional district, and will have an overwhelming majority in the Legislature. No disturbances are reported from any quarter.

TENNESSEE.

NASHVILLE, Nov. 2.—The vote over the State was unusually heavy. Owing to the multiplicity of candidates, the count is very slow. The contest is between Hawkins, Republican, for Governor, and Wright, State-Credit Democrat. Wilson, Repudiation Democrat, for Governor, is badly beaten. The Tennessee Congressional delegation is re-elected except in the First and Tenth districts, which are close and yet in doubt. Hancock's majority in the State will probably reach 40,000.

NASHVILLE, Nov. 3.—The State-Credit Democrats and Republicans are alike jubilant over the defeat of Wilson, the Repudiation candidate for Governor, and the election of Hawkins, Republican. The Republican gains have been so unexpected that a sensation was produced when it became known that the Republicans had probably elected forty-seven members to the Legislature, when it was anticipated that they would not have more than 33 at best. This will be a gain for the Republicans of 26 members. They will lack only 4 votes of having a majority. For Congress, Moore, Republican, has been elected over Casey Young, Democrat, in the Tenth district. The election of Pettibone, Republican, over Taylor, Democrat, in the First, is conceded.

KENTUCKY.

LOUISVILLE, Nov. 2.—The Democrats carry the State by the usual majority and secure all the members of Congress.

CINCINNATI, Nov. 3.—From all the advices up to this hour the Gazette, Republican, concedes the election of a solid Democratic delegation to Congress from Kentucky. This includes the Ninth and Tenth districts, heretofore claimed by the Republicans or considered doubtful.

ARKANSAS.

LITTLE ROCK, Nov. 2.—Election passed off quietly in this city, a light vote being cast.

MISSOURI.

ST. LOUIS, Nov. 2.—Returns indicate that the Hancock electors have a majority in the State of between 35,000 and 40,000, and the Democratic State ticket somewhat less. St. Louis elects the Democratic city ticket. The indications are that the Democrats carry every Congressional district in the State.

Western States.

OHIO.

COLUMBUS, Nov. 2.—The election was remarkably quiet and orderly here and throughout the State. A full vote has been polled, and Garfield's plurality is estimated at 30,000.

COLUMBUS, Nov. 4.—Thirty-seven counties, complete returns, show a Republican gain over 1879 of 13,890; four counties show a Democratic gain of 470; net Republican gain in forty-one counties, 13,420. The counties heard from include the largest in Ohio, but the gains in the remaining forty-seven counties will make Garfield's plurality about 35,000.

INDIANA.

INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 2.—Returns have been received from fully one-fourth of the State. Both parties have made gains, but they are so nearly even that it is generally thought the aggregate vote will not show a plurality much different from that for Porter in October.

INDIANAPOLIS, Nov. 4.—The returns, which continue to come in slowly, indicate that Garfield's plurality will exceed Porter's little, if any. In the counties composing the Third district the Democrats gain 610, as follows: Jackson, 178; Floyd, 202; Clark, 134; Washington, 117; Jennings, 96; Harrison, 87. So far as heard from, the following Democratic counties show Republican gains: Adams, 63; Carroll, 68; Dearborn, 58; Greene, 60; Posey, 69; Putnam, 80; Scott, 20; St. Joe, 252; Vigo, 145, and Whitley, 7. Full returns have been received from only thirty counties at this writing, which show a net Republican gain of 150.

ILLINOIS.

CHICAGO, Nov. 3.—Returns from Illinois indicate the triumph of the Republican electoral ticket by about 28,000. So far as returns are received it seems that Messrs. Aldrich, Davis, Farwell, Sherwin, Hawk, Henderson, Cullen, Payson, Lewis, Marsh, Smith, Cannon and Thomas, Republicans, are elected to Congress; Messrs. Townshend, Singleton, Sparks and Springer, Democrats, are elected; Morrison and Moulton, Democrats, are in doubt. The Legislature is Republican in both branches. Chicago made a clean sweep of electors, Congressmen and county ticket by between 4,000 and 5,000 Republican majority.

CHICAGO, Nov. 4.—The Republicans carried Chicago by a clean sweep, majorities ranging from 4,461 on President to 1,582 on Sheriff. Gen. Weaver received 1,042 votes in the city. Throughout the State Republican gains were made, and Garfield's majority, at this writing, is estimated at 30,000. A loss of one Congressman in the State is admitted by the Democrats in the Thirteenth district. The Legislature will be Republican in both branches.

MICHIGAN.

DETROIT, Mich., Nov. 2.—Estimates of the Republican State Committee are that the State has gone about 40,000 Republican majority. Returns at this hour from the Congressional districts are meager, but indicate that the Republicans have carried all.

DETROIT, Nov. 4.—Returns up to this morning show the State to have been carried by about 40,000 majority, with a clean sweep on Congressmen, and the Legislature strongly Republican.

WISCONSIN.

MILWAUKEE, Nov. 2.—This city gives Garfield a majority of 2,500. Deuster (Dem.) is re-elected to Congress. Reports from the interior of the State show enormous Republican gains, and insure nearly or quite 30,000 Republican majority in the State. Bouck, Democrat, is beaten for Congress in the Sixth by Guenther; Bragg, in the Fifth, has a reduced majority; Caswell carries the Second by 1,000.

IOWA.

DES MOINES, Nov. 2.—Returns come in slowly, on account of the great length of the ticket. Indications are, by reports in, that the total poll of the State will be 330,000, an increase of 35,000. Reports from ten precincts in the Seventh Congressional district indicate the election of Kasson (Rep.) by at least 3,000 majority.

KANSAS.

LEAVENWORTH, Nov. 2.—The indications are that the Republican majority for Garfield will be 45,000. The entire Republican Congressional delegation is returned by the following majorities: First district, Anderson, 15,000; Second, Ryan, 9,000; Third, Haskell, 4,000. The Prohibition amendment is carried. The other two amendments are defeated.

MINNESOTA.

MINNEAPOLIS, Nov. 2.—Returns come in slowly, but sufficient have been received to indicate that Dunnell is elected in the First Congressional district by 8,000 plurality. Strait in the Second district by 2,500 majority and Washburn in the Third district by 8,000 majority. The total Republican majority in the State will foot up 25,000.

MINNEAPOLIS, Nov. 3.—Returns, as far as received, indicate that Minnesota has given Garfield a majority of at least 25,000. The Republicans elect all the Congressmen by increased majorities.

NEBRASKA.

OMAHA, Nov. 2.—From scattered returns received from the State at large it is probable that Nebraska gives Garfield from 20,000 to 25,000 majority. Nance is re-elected Governor by the same figures. E. K. Valentine, for Congress, runs behind, but will poll 15,000 majority.

COLORADO.

DENVER, Nov. 2.—Arapahoe county gives from 900 to 1,000 Republican majority, a gain of nearly 200. The Republicans carry the State probably by an increased majority.

DENVER, Nov. 3.—Colorado is certainly Republican by at least 2,000. Pitkin's majority will be 3,000. Bedford is re-elected. The election was very quiet. The Democrats concede the State and make no claims.

NEVADA.

VIRGINIA CITY, Nov. 2.—The State is close, but has probably gone for Hancock by a small majority. The election of a Democratic Legislature is conceded. Cassidy (Democrat) for Congress, and Belknap (Democrat) for Supreme Judge, are probably elected. In Storey county the Democratic Legislative ticket is elected.

VIRGINIA CITY, Nov. 3.—This city and Gold Hill, which were formerly Republican strongholds, have gone Democratic. The Hancock electoral ticket and Daggett, Democrat, will have a small majority in the State. The Legislature is also Democratic, insuring the election of Fair, Democrat, to succeed Senator Sharon.

CALIFORNIA.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 3.—Returns received aggregate 47,800 votes, out of a total of fully 175,000 that have been cast throughout the State. These show that the State will certainly give Garfield 5,000, and perhaps 6,000 majority. There are heavy gains in the interior, and Garfield's majority in San Francisco will exceed 2,500. Three Republican Congressmen are undoubtedly elected, and the Third district contest is so close that it may require an official count to decide. Republicans have elected enough Assemblymen to give them a majority on joint ballot, insuring the election of a Republican to succeed Booth.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 3.—Returns of the State continue coming in rapidly, but are of such nature as to render it extremely difficult to forecast the result positively, but looks as if Hancock would carry the State by a small majority. Gen. Rosecrans is elected to Congress from this city.

OREGON.

PORTLAND, Nov. 2.—The vote is very close, and both parties are claiming the State.

SAN FRANCISCO, Nov. 3.—A Portland dispatch says the State is very close, and will, perhaps, require an official vote to decide. Both parties claim the State.

Abolishing Dog Latin.

An attempt has been made on the other side of the water to abolish the dog Latin hieroglyphics used by physicians in writing prescriptions for druggists. It has been asserted that this hideous jargon, together with bad penmanship, has been responsible for more fatal blunders in making up prescriptions than carelessness or ignorance on the part of the druggist. Doubtless in the "cultured" nineteenth century it seems supremely ridiculous to commence directions to a druggist with "R," which is the transformed sign of Jupiter, and, of course, an invocation to that planet to exercise a favorable influence over the subsequent course of the dose to be swallowed. However, most people think the "R" with the down stroke is a contraction for "Recipe," while they do not profess to understand (nor is it desired that they should understand) the cabalism which covers the rest of the sheet: "R. Spir. Scot. xiii. Suc. Dem. opt. xii. Liq. Lim. exp. q. s., ad. xviii. M. et Sol. sec. artem. Sig. Ij coch. mag. sum. intervello brev." Who would suppose that this was only a Hudibrascan method of directing that the patient should take a powerful glass of whisky punch on going to bed? However, the obscurity of the words is just one of the reasons why they are so dear to the practitioner. It is not advisable that crochety or nervous people should always know what they are getting.

THE Putnams are soon to publish a Japanese romance, translated by a Japanese student of Harvard. The work has a strongly dramatic plot, and is especially valuable for the light it throws upon Japanese life and modes of thought. There will be thirty-eight full-page illustrations by a famous Japanese artist.

AUBURN COURIER.

ROB. J. LOWRY,
Editor.

The Governor of Australia receives the same salary as the President of the United States.

There is a brick famine in the West, so great has been the amount of building this season.

The First National, of New York, is reported to be the only institution of the kind in the world that in one year divided $1,500,000 profit on a $500,000 capital.

Telegraphic communication with many of the scattered military posts in the Northern Territories has been opened by the completion of the signal-service wire from Bismarck, Dakota, to Dayton, Washington Territory.

Mayor Bonny and Ald. Whitla, of Dallas, Tex., lost their tempers while discussing municipal affairs in a meeting of the Common Council. Each said the other was a liar, and both expressed a desire for a hostile meeting. They met in the rear of a saloon, at midnight, and fought with their fists.

John Shepherd, a farmer near Peoria, Ill., has faithfully kept an oath made in 1860 not to cut his hair or shave until the election of a Democratic President. His whiskers reach nearly to his waist, and his hair is kept in braids. He evidently accepted the finding of the Electoral Commission as cheerfully as did Hayes.

The completion of the Southern Pacific railroad is looked for by the farmers of California to open a new and favorable route for the export of their vast surplus wheat crop. It is even prophesied that this route, via the Southern Pacific, New Orleans and the Gulf, will carry the entire crop of that State almost immediately after its opening, and that wheat alone will give the road 60,000 tons of freight a month.

The discovery of beds of genuine anthracite in the far West is one of the surprises of recent explorations in New Mexico. Bituminous coal is common enough west of the Mississippi, but veins of true anthracite have generally been confined to "wild-cat prospectuses." That there are inexhaustible beds of anthracite in the Old Placer range, and that the coal compares well with the Pennsylvania deposits, is the conclusion which a New York Tribune correspondent has reached after going over the ground.

There is a girl under treatment at Bellevue Hospital, New York, for inability to use her legs. She wore gaiters with inordinately-high French heels. The distortion of her feet and ankles caused an undue tension of the cords and muscles of her calves. She persisted, however, until her legs became misshapen, and finally she was wholly disabled by lameness. She lies unfashionably on her back now, with her unhandsome feet and legs in a shaping apparatus, enduring a great deal of pain, and uncertain whether she will ever be able to walk without crutches.

The Boogher family, of St. Louis, Mo., believe themselves rightful heirs to a large estate in Baltimore. They claim that about 750 acres of land lying on both sides of Jones' falls, which divides the city of Baltimore in twain, belonged originally to William Richardson. This land was leased in several parcels at different times and to different persons for ninety-nine years, the title no being fully vested in the lessee. Within the last seven years the oldest of the leases expired, and three years ago the latest one expired. William F. Boogher, of St. Louis, has charge of the prosecution of the claim. The value of the property is estimated at $40,000,000.

An Indian thief was turned over to the chief of his tribe, at San Diego, Cal., and by him sentenced to receive 100 lashes. The culprit was a big, powerful fellow; but he submitted quietly to being tied to the side of a high wagon, with his legs and arms extended, and his back bared. A stalwart Indian struck the blows with all his might, using a leather lariat, and making the blood flow at every stroke. The victim endured the dreadful torture for a while, and then broke out into agonized screams. If he had remained silent to the end, the chief would have restored him to the tribe; but, as he "cried like a coward baby," he was afterward driven out of the neighborhood.

France has agricultural schools for girls. The chief one is near Rouen, and is worth $160,000. It was begun from a capital of 1 franc by a Sister of Charity and two small discharged prisoner girls. The establishment has now 300 girls, ranging in age from 6 to 18. The farm, cultivated by them, is over 400 acres in extent. Twenty-five sisters form the staff of teachers. The French Agricultural Society has awarded many medals to this establishment at Dametel, and the pupils are in great demand all over Normandy on account of their skill. They go out as stewards, gardeners, farm managers, dairy women and dressmakers. Each girl has, on leaving, an outfit and a small sum of money, earned in spare hours. If they want a home, they can always return to the farm, which they are taught to regard as home.

The last survivor of the wreck of the Medusa has just died at Bordeaux. Cæsar Alphonse Henry was born at Paris in 1812, and three years afterward his father embarked in the Medusa with his whole family of eight persons. Every one knows the fate of the Medusa. Of its living freight of 450 souls 175 were put on the raft which Gericault has rendered memorable in his picture, sixteen remained on board, and 200 took to the boats and gained the African coast nearly 300 miles from the French settlement at St. Louis. The Henry family were among these last. The 3-year-old child walked part of the way across the burning, waterless sands; part of the way he was carried by the sailors. The little caravan sowed its route with corpses, but the survivors arrived safely at St. Louis, and among them the Henry family, safe and well from the eldest to the youngest—a result mainly due to the energy of the father.

A lion-tamer in a menagerie at San Francisco gave a Chronicle reporter some cruel facts about the training of beasts. He said there was real danger in the business. He had seen two men killed and one badly bitten once himself, but he charged these mishaps to carelessness and too much mercy. "You learn to tell," he explained, "what kind of a temper the beasts are in, and conduct yourself accordingly. It ain't hard to dodge them. If they spring straight at you, all you've got to do is to jump a little one side, and if they jump high for your throat you dive under 'em. There's never more than one goes for you at a time, and that don't occur often. The wild ones are better and safer. This is because a lion used to a cage and to being poked and teased is less afraid of you. I'd sooner handle ten lions just from the jungles than one that's used to the public. When I first go into a cage of untamed ones I'd have a fire near by, with three or four iron rods in it, red hot. If the beasts go for me, the men stand ready to jab the irons in their mouths and make 'em let go." He scouted the idea that lions could be governed except by fear, excited by inhuman treatment. He tried never to err on the side of gentleness, and had recently killed a lion by striking it a little too hard on the head.

BRITISH OPINION.

Comments of the London Press on Our Presidential Election.

The London papers comment freely upon our great national political contest. The Times says:

"There are good reasons for believing that Gen. Garfield's administration will be like the present—moderate in policy. Though we must regret that civil-service reform and free trade have been equally thrust into the background during the campaign, and are evidently not for the moment eagerly desired by any considerable proportion of the American people, the abatement of the animosities on both sides which were kindled even so recently as the contest of 1876 by the Southern question permits us to hope that very soon the sectional divisions of the republic will be obliterated, and be supplanted by a division of parties unconnected with the slave system and the civil war. The foreign policy of the Republican party, in spite of the friction caused by the war and the Alabama claims, has been on the whole friendly to this country and to peace all over the world."

The Post remarks: "With the result, so far as European powers are interested in American politics, we on this side of the Atlantic have reason to be satisfied. Whether a Republican or a Democrat rules at Washington is a matter which now exclusively interests the citizens of the republic; nor is it probable even if the twenty years of uninterrupted reign of the Republican party had been now broken that the relations subsisting between the United States and ourselves would have undergone any perceptible change. We have had our differences of late years with the American Government, but these differences have been happily terminated. We therefore have every reason to conclude that during the next four years of Republican supremacy the relations between the United States and Great Britain will not only be undisturbed but be thoroughly cordial."

The Advertiser says: "We cannot but regret the result. In the first place there is no comparison between the merits of two men. Garfield is third-rate Republican party politician, belonging not perhaps to the school of the Blaines, Conklings and Camerons, but quite as little to that of the reformers like Adams or administrators like Sherman. He is the nominee of the wire-pulling interest. Hancock is, with few exceptions, the most distinguished, and, without a single exception, we believe, the most loyal, honest, and high-minded soldier still in the active service of the Union."

The Standard says: "The administration of Gen. Garfield is not likely to differ materially in policy from that of Mr. Hayes. It is, indeed, probable enough that the old Senatorial ring which was master of the situation during Gen. Grant's second Presidency, and which strove hard to carry the third-term movement to a successful issue, will become more powerful than it has been of late, and will once more monopolize and employ for its own purposes the patronage of the Government and its Executive influences."

The Pall Mall Gazette says: "It would be a mistake to regard Gen. Garfield's election as a triumph of the politicians who brought discredit on Gen. Grant. The strong feeling in the United States in favor of the honest and patriotic policy of the present Cabinet would teach far less shrewd men than Gen. Garfield to follow the lines laid down by Mr. Hayes. For England the situation is satisfactory, as it resulted in a victory for the party which is most inclined to encourage satisfactory relations between England and America."

The Daily News says: "The chances seem to be that during the next four years, contrary to the expectations of some politicians, the South will become more reconciled to the Union, and the North will not be divided against itself. The result is one of more importance than foreign observers fully recognize."

A country paper speaks of a meteor "about as large as a basket." The tail must have been as long as a piece of string.—Chicago Inter-Ocean.

FARM NOTES.

Drying Tobacco.—Light colors are not desirable and are produced by rapid drying. In curing tobacco endeavor to let it dry slowly, taking care, however, that it does not pole-burn.

Worms in Horses.—To destroy pinworms in horses, give an injection of salt and water two or three days in succession, then administer a ball consisting of an ounce of aloes and one drachm of calomel.—N. Y. Herald.

Exercise for Fowls.—A new way of furnishing hens that are confined in a small space with an abundance of exercise is recommended by an exchange. A piece of meat is suspended by a string, just so high that the fowls will have to make a good jump to reach it. We suppose other kinds of food might be thus placed, and no hen would be without the incentive to take the necessary exercise while eating her daily food.

Assorting Fruit.—Great injury has been done by the careless way in which some growers put up their fruit. It pays in the end to give close attention to assorting, and those who mark their grades honestly and put their names on their packages will soon obtain the highest prices. It may require years for a fruit raiser to establish a reputation, but when this is accomplished he will always obtain ready sales and be able to command good prices.

Salt to Poultry.—We clip the following useful hints: Hens often have a habit of biting and pulling at their feathers, and greedily eating them until their bodies are bear. This practice it is believed, is occasioned by a want of salt, as when salted food is given them, they make no attempt to continue the habit. Salt pork chopped fine and fed twice a week, has been adopted with success, while others put a teaspoonful of salt with two quarts of meal or shorts moistened, well mixed, and feed it about twice every week. Fowls, like human beings, to be healthy, must have a certain allowance of salt.

Coal for Paint.—Suel Foster, of Muscatine, writes the Iowa Homestead as follows: "Let me again recommend this article for old wheels, new wheels, wagon wheels, buggy wheels, wheel barrows, etc. I have used it several years, and know it is the best paint ever used. This year my buggy needed painting—some of the spokes rattled, and some of the woodwork about the bed rattled a little, and when my man was tarring the wheels of the big wagon, the two-horse spring wagon and the one-horse spring wagon, he gave the buggy a coat all over—running-gear, shafts, dash board, inside and out, all over, and now the old rattle-trap looks and runs like a new buggy, runs as silent as a midnight hour, and shines as black as a black jet glass bead. Try it; it saves half the cost of setting tires; that is, they will not need setting half as often."

Saving Seed Corn.—We frequently have the vitality of our corn killed by early frosts, and consequently get a poor stand of corn the next season. The preventive is, as soon as there is danger of frost to go into the cornfield and select the ripest and fairest ears, and plenty of them. Save only ears that have small cobs and deep kernels. Either braid it up by a few husks left on each ear, or make a scaffold in the loft of some building, where a good circulation of air can be had. A scaffold can be made by nailing sticks from rafter to rafter, and then laying small poles on. When the corn is first put up, do not lay it too thick, as the cob may not dry out, and it may heat and spoil. Spread out thin.—Country Gentleman.

Making Clay Soil Fertile.—In the Maine Farmer is related the experienced of Jonathan Weston in making clay soil productive. He says his soil was "a stiff, hard clay; now it is a clay loam and yields good crops. After plowing the hardest and poorest acre in my field, which I did soon after haying, I told a boy and French horse that when they had nothing else to do it would be their business to haul sand on to this land. I do not now recollect, but think we hauled one hundred and fifty or two hundred one-horse loads. The next spring, with a heavy cultivator, I thoroughly mixed this sand with the clay, and, without a shovelful of any kind of dressing, sowed it to oats and grass seed. The result was beyond my most sanguine expectations, yielding an average of two tons a year, with the exception of the first and last, for the next eight years, after which I plowed again and applied the same remedy to the other side of the furrow. Now, after the liberal application of sand for so many years my hard clay was dissolved, and I have in place of it a good, mellow loam. And instead of cutting eight or ten tons of hay, as formerly, I now cut in good seasons forty tons. For the last twenty years I have sold as much hay on an average each as the farm cut when I commenced, and yet I have never purchased $50 worth of manure."

What an Old Farmer Says.—This is the advice of an old man who has tilled the soil for forty years: I am an old man, upwards of three score years, during two score of which I have been a tiller of the soil. I cannot say that I am now, but I have been rich, and have all I need; do not owe a dollar, have given my children a good education, and when I am called away, to leave them enough to keep the wolf from the door. My experience has taught me that:

1. One acre of land, well prepared and well cultivated, produces more than two which receive only the same amount of labor used on one.
2. One cow, horse, mule, sheep or hog, well fed, is more profitable than two kept on the same amount necessary to keep one well.
3. One acre of clover or grass is worth more than two of cotton where no grass or clover is raised.
4. No farmer who buys oats, corn, or wheat, fodder and hay, as a rule, for ten years, can keep the Sheriff away from the door in the end.
5. The farmer who never reads the papers, sneers at book-farming and improvements, always has a leaky roof, poor stock, broken down fences, and complains of bad "seasons."
6. The farmer who is above his business and intrusts it to another to manage, soon has no business to attend to.
7. The farmer whose habitual beverage is cold water, is healthier, wealthier and wiser than he who does not refuse to drink.

At Athens, Ga., a negro who was recently bit by a mad dog went to the Sheriff and asked to be chained in a cell, lest he should be attacked by hydrophobia and bite some one else. The Sheriff complied, and the poor fellow is now in durance, awaiting death, as he thinks.

HOUSEKEEPERS' HELPS.

To Clarify Fat.—Cut into small pieces, fat of either beef or mutton. Put into a sauce pan and cover the pieces with cold water. Stir until the water boils, skim carefully and allow to boil until the water has been discharged in vapor—the fat will then be of the color of salad oil—strain, and it will keep any length of time.

Apple Batter Pudding.—Four beaten eggs, one pint of rich milk, two cups of flour, one teaspoonful of salt, two even teaspoonfuls of baking powder. Peel and core eight ripe, tart apples; put into a deep baking-dish; fill the center of each with sugar and pour the beaten batter over them. Bake an hour, and eat with cream and sugar, flavored with nutmeg or lemon.

Good Apple Butter.—Boil a kettleful of new cider until reduced two-thirds. Have a quantity of tart, juicy apples pared, cored, and sliced, and put as many into the kettle as the cider will cover. Cook slowly until tender, skim out and put in a second supply of apples. When tender turn all out and let stand over night. In the morning return to the kettle and boil down until quite thick. Add whatever spice you please. It requires almost constant stirring.

Omelet.—Beat the yolks of eight eggs and the whites of four until very light, stir in a teacup of cream in which a tablespoonful of flour has been mixed and season with salt and pepper. Melt a tablespoonful of butter in a baking-pan, pour in the mixture and set the pan in a hot oven. When it thickens spread over the remaining whites beaten to a froth. Return to the oven and bake a delicate brown. Slip on a large platter and serve at once.

Quince Preserves.—Pare, quarter, and core, saving the skins and cores. Just cover the quarters of quince with cold water and simmer until tender. Take out the pieces carefully, and lay on flat plates. Add the parings, etc., to the water, cover tightly and stew an hour. Strain through a jelly-bag, and to each pint of the juice add a pound of granulated sugar. Boil, skim, add the pieces of quince, and boil gently ten minutes, take out onto flat dishes and set in the sun. Let the syrup boil until it begins to jelly, then fill the glass cans two-thirds full and cover with the syrup.

Cocoa from the Nibs.—Put two quarts of very hot water into a three-quart enameled saucepan for every one-quart pound of ground cocoa nibs, and stir well together. Boil gently, but incessantly, for eight hours, and stir occasionally. Strain off the liquid into a basin and let it stand until quite cold, when the fat (or butter) should be skimmed off. Warm up the cocoa for use. The cocoa nibs will reboil several times if a little fresh be added. The butter of cocoa is valuable for chapped hands, sore lips and burns, &c. I tried the whole nibs, but discarded them in favor of the ground, and have used the above recipe for years to the general satisfaction of my friends.

Crisp Oatmeal Cake.—Rub a quarter of a pound of dripping or lard into half a pound of oatmeal, into which you have mixed a large pinch of carbonate of soda and of salt. Make into a dough with a gill of cold water, shake meal plentifully on the board, turn your dough on to it, and, having sprinkled this also with meal, work it with the backs of your fingers as little as possible. Roll the dough out to the thickness of a crown piece—cut in shapes—the lid of a saucepan or a glass answers well for this purpose—put the cakes on a hot stove, and, when a little brown on the under side, take them off and place on a hanger before fire the in order to brown the upper side; this done, the cakes will be ready for use. If to be kept, put them away in a tin box in a dry place, and when required for table put them in the oven for five minutes to warm them through and recrisp them.

LATER ELECTION RETURNS.

Garfield's majority in Illinois is estimated at 35,000. The delegation in Congress stands 13 Republicans to 6 Democrats. The Republicans have a majority in the Legislature of 24 on joint ballot.

The next Wisconsin Legislature will stand as follows: Senate, 21 Republicans, 9 Democrats; Assembly, 78 Republicans, 21 Democrats, and 1 Independent.

It is thought that Hancock's majority in North Carolina will reach 10,000; that the Congressional delegation will include one Republican, and the Legislature will be Democratic.

San Francisco dispatches state that later returns settle it beyond doubt that Garfield has carried California by a plurality over Hancock of between 2,000 and 3,000, and that the Legislature is Republican. The Congressional delegation stands: Page and Pacheco, Republicans, and Rosecrans and Berry, Democrats.

Oregon's vote is very close, but the returns indicate that Garfield will have a majority of about 300.

Garfield's plurality in Kansas is between 50,000 and 60,000, and the Legislature is overwhelmingly Republican.

Garfield's plurality in Massachusetts is 53,000. Morse, Democrat, is re-elected to Congress from Boston.

Ludlow's majority over Potts, for Governor of New Jersey, is about 600. The majority for the Democratic electoral ticket is about 2,000.

In Dakota, Pettigrew, Republican, is elected to Congress by 5,000 majority.

Returns complete and partial from 66 counties out of 94 in Tennessee give Hawkins, for Governor, 76,166; Wright, 64,787; Wilson, 49,316. Owing to dissensions among the Democrats on account of the State debt issue, the Republicans came within four votes of securing the Legislature.

In Nevada, the returns come in slowly. The State is close on Electors and Congress. The Legislature is probably Democratic on joint ballot. The Senate is Republican.

The entire Republican state ticket is elected in Michigan by a large majority; the Congressional delegation is unanimously Republican, and Garfield carried the State by about 35,000 or 40,000 majority.

Hancock's plurality in West Virginia is about 12,000.

The Territorial election in Arizona resulted as follows: G. H. Oury, Democrat, delegate to Congress; M. H. Sherman, Republican, Superintendent of Public Instruction. The Legislature is Republican by a large majority.

INDIANA NEWS.

James Vogus, who murdered his father at Kokomo, last June, has pleaded guilty and been sentenced to imprisonment for life.

The Union District Medical Society of Eastern Indiana and Western Ohio will hold its annual meeting at Rushville Oct. 28.

James M. Ray is the only living citizen who voted at the first election held in Indianapolis in 1822, when he was chosen County Clerk.

Mrs. Emily A. Roache has resigned as manager of the Female Reformatory, and Gov. Williams has appointed Mrs. Eliza J. Dodd to the vacancy.

The National Association of Railway, Omnibus and Transfer Lines will hold its next meeting in Indianapolis, third Tuesday of next April.

In jumping out of a wagon while the horses attached were running away Wm. Butler, of Bedford, fractured his pelvis bone, a rare and painful accident.

Walnut stumps, knotted and curled, are being dug from the ground by farmers and sold at big prices to Eastern dealers who are in New Albany to purchase them.

George Benner challenged the vote of Lark Wills, at Muncie, and the Wills brothers broke his head. His brains were exposed, and the wound is pronounced mortal.

C. W. Janverin, a young chemist from Davenport, Iowa, fell in the streets of Vincennes, the other evening, under an attack of delirium tremens, and was at last accounts in a critical condition.

At Fort Wayne, the case of Julia Roney vs. the Pennsylvania Company, for killing her husband in an accident a year ago last March, was decided in favor of the plaintiff, to the amount of $5,000.

The annual report of the Treasurer of State will show a total receipt of $3,130,180.69 from counties for the December and May settlements. The amount is about $120,000 less than it has been for the past six years.

The Governor of Indiana appointed one Marshal from each Cogressional district to collect the vote for Presidential electors. These appointments were made in accordance with an ancient act of the Legislature.

The gate receipts of the State Fair, this year, were about $14,000; last year they were over $18,000, but, owing to the decreased expenses this year, the net receipts are as great as those of 1879, viz.—$4,000.

F. M. Compton, of Claypool, Kosciusko county, was robbed of $1,100 on a Cincinnati, Wabash and Michigan train, between Warsaw and Claypool. His pocket was cut entirely out. The car was full of passengers, and he don't know when it was taken or by whom.

A saloon in Richmond was cleaned out a few days since by Mrs. Frank Early, whose husband had been lying drunk in it for nearly a week. She shied beer glasses through the large mirrors, smashed the bottles with a bung-starter, and splintered the plate-glass windows with cracker dishes. The place was completely gutted, and presented the appearance of having gone through a hundred days' siege.

The Sate Council of Red Men at their meeting, in Madison, elected E. G. Darnall, of Lebanon, Great Sachem; John F. Sanders, of Muncie, Senior Sagamore; J. C. Suit, of Franklin, Junior Sagamore; John W. Verry, of Madison, Keeper of Wampum; Geo. F. David, of Indianapolis, Chief of Records; Mark C. Smith, of Frankfort, Great Prophet; M. A. Marks, of Madison, Representative to the National Grand Council.

A party was out coon hunting in Adams township, Hamilton county, the other night, when it became necessary to fell a tree to secure the game. As it was about to fall, several of the party ran under it to break up a dog fight, and save the dogs, but were themselves caught, Merrill Losey, a stepson of Gus Venable, being so hurt about the head and internally that he died next morning, and Robert Stevenson having a leg broken and receiving other injuries.

Archie Kelley, of Cincinnati, an employe of the American Union Telegraph Company, while engaged in carrying the wires of the company across the Ohio river bridge, at Louisville, fell from the north end of the bridge, a distance of ninety feet, to the naked rocks below, and was instantly killed. In his descent the unfortunate man turned two somersaults, landing on his back on the jagged rocks below. His bones were literally crushed into fragments. His death was instantaneous.

Paris Journals.

Paris journalists believe in centralization, as their method of carrying on business proves. A printer leases a large building, in which he puts down a steam engine and several presses. A capacious room centrally situated is set apart for the compositors, and offices in various parts of the establishment are placed at the disposal of the editorial staffs of the journals that are printed on the premises. Some of these papers may have their own compositors and their own types—that is a matter of arrangement; but everything is set up in the common room and printed in the landlord printer's presses. As the compositors of the various journals are only separated from each other by imaginary divisions, awkward accidents occasionally befall. In the hurry of going to press, or in the dim light (French composing rooms being rarely fitted up with gas), it sometimes happens that "copy" goes astray, or paragraphs get mixed; and the readers of contemporary papers are, in consequence, frequently horrified by marked contradictions in their favorite sheets.

There are 5,000 telegraph offices in France. Last year the number of dispatches sent averaged thirty for every 100 inhabitants.

Auburn Courier.

AUBURN, IND., NOVEMBER 11, 1880.

PORTER'S exact plurality in this state is 6,953.

THE man who will sell his vote should be disfranchised for life.

JOHN SHERMAN is talked of as the proper man to take Garfield's senatorial seat.

DR. TANNER, the faster, will shortly go to London to repeat his forty days' fast.

THE working class will expect an increase of wages, now that Garfield is elected.

MCCLELLAN, Seymour, Tilden and Hancock make four defeated democratic candidates now living.

HANCOCK says he will not be a technical president. He is very different from Mr. Hayes in this regard.

IT was claimed that millions of capital would be invested in manufactories if Garfield was elected. The poor men are waiting for the boom.

THE New York Herald figures Garfields popular majority over Hancock at 20,000. Garfield has not got a majority of the popular vote.

"MONEY makes the mare go." It also makes republican victories, and as Hon. John C. New has the money, it is prophesied that he will be the next United States senator.

AN engine has just been completed at Paterson, New Jersey, which is intended to run ninety miles an hour. The speed is gained by double driving wheels.

THE names of those prominently mentioned to succeed Senator Joseph E. McDonald, our present senator, are Judge John Morris, Robert S. Taylor, Ben. Harrison and Hon. John C. New.

GEN. GARFIELD is a member of the house of representatives until the 4th of March next. He is also United States Senator-elect and President. No other American ever had so many offices crowded on to him at once.

A TELEGRAM from Memphis, Tennessee, of Nov. 8, indicates the election of a republican negro named Johnson, in the first congressional district, over Poindexter Dunn, by 1,000 majority. Johnson is a barber, residing in Augusta, Ark. His candidacy was announced but one week prior to the election.

THE congressmen elected in Indiana are as follows: "1st district, Wm. Heilman, rep.; 2d, Thos. C. Robb, dem.; 3d, S. Stockslanger, dem.; 4th, W. S. Holman, dem.; 5th, C. C. Matson, dem.; 6th, T. M. Brown, rep.; 7th, S. J. Peel, rep.; 8th, R. B. S. Pierce, rep.; 9th, G. S. Orth, rep.; 10th, M. L. DeMotte, rep.; 11th, G. W. Steele, rep.; 12th, W. G. Colerick, dem.; 13th, W. H. Calkins, rep.

SARA BARNHARDT, the sensational French actress, has reached the United States at last. She made her debut in New York City last Monday evening to an audience of 4,000 people. Her appearance was the signal for prolonged and enthusiastic applause. Sara has never been married, but it is said she is the mother of several children." This trifling circumstance, however, will probably not mitigate her popularity with Americans.

A NUMBER of gentlemen called on Gen. Hancock a day or two after the election. "You are the happiest looking democrat I have seen since the election," remarked Gen. Stickles to him, evidently taken completely by surprise at the smiling reception he received.

"I see no reason to be unhappy as far as I am personally concerned," observed the general. "The only cause for unhappiness is the failure of the democratic party, of whose faith and principles I have been made the exponent."

ULYSSES S. GRANT jr., was married last Monday to Miss Fannie J., daughter of ex-Senator Jerome B. Chaffee, of Colorado. The wedding took place in New York City, at the residence of the bride's father. The Kendallville Standard, of November 4, in speaking of the marriage, says: "Mr. Chaffee will be remembered as a former resident of this county, having lived for a time at Albion, and later in Ligonier. When here, he was a general merchant. He went to Colorado a number of years ago. Miss Fannie is an only child, her mother has been dead many years, and Mr. Chaffee is now a widower."

Corrupting the People.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

There are said to be 12,000 government clerks employed in Washington; their salaries will average $1,200. The total assessments for the campaign amount to 8 per cent.—a total of $1,152,000. The assessments upon other clerks, together with contributions from national banks and wealthy republicans, have doubtless raised $5,000,000 for the campaign. In this way the integrity of the country is debauched, the people cheated out of their rights, and their liberties imperiled.

OFFICIAL VOTE.

The following table shows the official vote of DeKalb county, by townships and precincts, of the November election, 1880:

A WASHINGTON dispatch says: "The forth-coming annual report of General Sherman will be his last, as he has determined to carry into effect an intention frequently expressed to go upon the retired list next spring, having served the thirty years required by section 1,243 of the revised statutes to qualify him for voluntary retirement. The title of 'general' is exclusively his own, and his retirement will not make a vacancy on the active list. It will, however, bring Lieutenant-General Sheridan to Washington as commander of the army, and will open the way for Major-General Hancock's transfer to Chicago as commander of the great and important military division embracing nearly the whole theater of Indiana operations and the greater part of the active forces of the army. The custom of the service which places this command at the acceptance of General Hancock accords him also the privilege of declining it should he prefer his present command and residence or duties, and should he avail himself of this privilege the successor of Lieutenant-General Sheridan at Chicago will doubtless be Major-General Schofield, who has the reputation among his profession of being in an especial sense the intellectual member of the corps of general officers of all grades. General Schofield's residence at West Point has not been altogether an agreeable one, and it is understood here that he himself recognizes the fact that playing pedagogue over some score of unruly boys is hardly congenial to his rank or capacities. As the retirement of Gen. Sherman will cause no vacancy, the command of the western division, should Gen. Hancock decline it, must devolve upon either Gen. Schofield or Gen. McDowell, as it could not well be conferred upon one of the brigadiers."

THE Cincinnati Commercial of Saturday, remarks:

"If the democrats have secured the legislature of California, Nevada, New Jersey, and as seems probable, that of Tennessee, they will have thirty-nine senators, making exactly a tie. Should Mahone, of Virginia, vote with them, they could control the senate by one majority. How he will vote is a matter of some conjecture. Should either California, Nevada, New Jersey or Tennessee elect a republican senator there will be a tie, and with the casting vote of Vice-President Arthur the republicans secure the control. Latest advices from California indicate that the legislature of the state is republican, which assures the election of the senator whose vote will make the tie."

THIS is inaccurate. Thirty-eight democratic senators will take their seats on the fourth day of March, next—thirty-one from the south and seven from the north. This makes a tie in that body. The casting vote of the vice-president would give the republicans a majority of one. Kellogg will be the only republican senator from Delaware to Texas. The democratic Senators who hold over from the north are McPherson, of New Jersey; Pendleton, of Ohio; Voorhees, of Indiana; Davis, of Illinois; Farley, of California; Grover and Slater, of Oregon. There is scarcely a doubt but Fair will be elected by the legislature of Nevada. If so, the senate will stand in the next congress, thirty-nine democrats and thirty-seven republicans, or a democratic majority of two. These are facts which can be relied on.

The republican party, succeeded in defeating General Hancock, but not in disgracing him. The Troy (N. Y.) Times says:

Poor Hancock is to be pitied. Although a weak, vain and ambitious man, he was too good a soldier to be slaughtered by the democratic party.

Upon the foregoing the New York Sun remarks that the Times' paragraph "is unworthy of even a Garfield advocate after election. General Hancock is not weak or vain. He is an able, just, upright, noble-minded man; and if he had been weak, the battle of Gettysburg might have ended very differently. Neither is he ambitious in the low sense intended by the above slur. His ambition is perfectly honorable, because his first thought is to serve his country. No design of promoting dishonest cronies or base-hearted parasites, no scheme against the public treasury, enters into it. Such ambition as his is deserving of nothing but respect and admiration. Neither has he been slaughtered by the party which nominated him at Cincinnati. He has been supported earnestly and manfully by the democratic masses. A clear majority of the popular suffrages is his. In spite of unprecedented difficulties and of every discouragement, they have carried him so near to an election that the republicans have nothing to exult over as respects the margin of their success. They have won through the incompetence, stupidity, meanness, or treachery of so-called democratic leaders here in this city. But General Hancock has every reason to be proud of the support he has received, and the democracy need not be ashamed of the gallant candidate whom they have barely failed to elect."

Up Salt River.

The expression "Up Salt river," is one much used at present, and a history of its origin may not be uninteresting, as it is probable that few know the origin of it. The following explanation has been given and established as the true one:

Davy Crockett, the famous Kentucky congressman, while a whig candidate, was challenged by his opponent to meet him on the stump in joint discussion. Crockett accepted, and the day and place was fixed. But Crockett did not appear, and the people thinking him afraid to do so, rallied for his opponent and elected him. It afterward turned out that Crockett, who had started for the place in a canoe propelled by a negro, has been landed near the head waters of Salt river, by his treacherous guide, who then paddled down the stream. Crocket was too good a hunter to starve in the wilderness; but he was totally unable to reach the appointed place in time, and with it his chance of election. Hence the phrase: 'Up Salt river,' meaning that party is hopelessly defeated. Crockett, however, was more lucky two years afterward, being elected by a handsome majority.

Sunday-School Institute.

The Richland township Sunday-school quarterly institute, which was held at Sedan, Nov. 6, 1880, was called to order by the president. In consequence of the inclemency of the weather, the attendance was not very large, and it was concluded not to follow the previously prepared programme. A motion was made and carried that the president appoint a committee to prepare a programme for the afternoon, and Messrs. Hyne, L. Rice and L. W. Tresh were appointed such committee.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

Exercises opened by singing and prayer by the president. Address by Rev. L. Rice, subject: "The relation and duty of the pastor to the Sunday-school." Remarks by Peter Treesh and Levi Harding. Song: "Jesus loves the little child." "The relation and duty of chuch members to the Sunday-school," was discussed by J. B. Scott, L. Rice, L. W. Treesh, L. Harding and others. Song: "What will the recompense be?" followed by the discussion of the subject, "The relation and duty of the community to the Sunday-school," by N. McIntyre, Mrs. Hyne and L. Rice. "The relation and duty of the pastor, superintendent and teachers to each other," by Mrs Hyne, was ably considered. "Rest by and by," was then sung, and a motion was made and carried that the next regular township institute be held at Sedan, on Saturday, Nov. 20, 1880. Benediction by Y. Harding.

Kendallville News: "Vall Zimmerman, who, it is claimed, is not of age, voted at Waterloo. It is said that R. W. McBride induced him to cast his vote."

Mrs. Julia Roney was awarded by the superior court jury Oct. 30, a verdict of $5,000 against the Pennsylvania railroad company, for the killing of her husband, an employe of the road, at Valparaiso in March, 1870.

The Lgarange Register of last week says: "There is substantially a blockade of produce and live stock that is anxious to reach a market here at Lagrange. The town is losing thousand of dollars daily in consequence of the inability of the G. R. & I. R. R. to carry this produce. The result is that our farmers, at a sacrifice, are obliged to haul their grain to other markets, causing Lagrange to lose a heavy trade that always follows the marketing of the produce of the country. It is said that our town lost $100,000 a year ago from the same cause, and it is likely to be repeated again this fall. A careful consideration of this condition of things will at once convince our farmers and business men of the necessity of the long-talked-of east and west railway, and these things should be remembered when such roads are contemplated."

SHOT ACCIDENTALLY.—One of the saddest accidental deaths that ever occured in this section of the country occured in South Wabash, October 28. In the morning Frank Ridgeway, son of Friend David Ridgeway, aged about twenty years, started out squirrel hunting. He carried a muzzle-loading gun which he had long been used to handling. When night came he did not return, and early this morning his family, seriously alarmed at his absence, started out in search of him. About nine o'clock they found him lying stark and cold in death near the large crib of Mr. Allen Smith. His gun was lying near, discharged, and a gaping wound in the side of Frank's face told the story. It is supposed that while loading the gun it was accidentally discharged and the load entering his face ranged up into the brain. Death must have been instantaneous. His faithful dog stayed beside the body all night and was found guarding him in the morning. Frank was a bright and promising youth whose shocking and untimely death brings deep mourning to a large circle of friends.—[Wabash Plaindealer.

Notice is hereby given to the citizens of Concord township that I will apply to the board of commissioners of DeKalb county, at their next regular session, commencing December 6, 1880, for a license to retail spirituous, vinous and malt liquors in a quantity less than a quart at a time, with the privilege of having the same drank on the following described premises: Commencing thirty feet north and thirty feet west of the corner post of Washington street and section line road, thence north fifty feet, thence west one hundred and fifty feet, thence south fifty feet, thence east one hundred and fifty feet to the place of beginning, in section sixteen, township thirty three north, range fourteen east, in the village of St. Joe, in Concord township, DeKalb county, Ind.

Nov. 8, 1880. CURTIS A. WASHLER.

Attachment Notice.

Before Jacob Walborn, justice of the peace of Union township, DeKalb county, Indiana.

Thomas Summers,
vs.
Joseph Grossell.

Whereas, the plaintiff in the above entitled cause, has this day filed with me his affidavit and bond in attachment, and a summons having been issued and returned not found, and a writ of attachment having also been issed, and a summons in garnishement having been issued thereon, and property by virtue of said writ been attached, and it also appears that the defendant is a non-resident of the state of Indiana.

Therefore the said defendant and all persons interested are hereby notified that said cause is set for trial on the 31st day of December, 1880, at 9 o'clock a. m., before me, the undersigned, at my office, in the town of Auburn, DeKalb county, Indiana.

46-3. JACOB WALBORN, J. P. [SEAL.]

TO THE AFFLICTED.

Since the introduction of Kellogg's Columbian Oil, it has made more permanent cures and given better satisfaction on kidney complaints and rheumatism than any known remedy. Its continued series of wonderful cures, in all climates, has made it known as a safe and reliable agent to employ against all aches and pains, which are the forerunners of more serious disorders. It acts speedily and surely, always relieving suffering and often saving life. The protection it affords by its timely use on rheumatism, kidney affection, and all aches and pains, wounds, cramping pains, cholera morbus, diarrhoea, coughs, colds, catarrh and disorders among children, makes it an invaluable remedy to be kept always on hand in every house. No person can afford to be without it, and those who have once used it never will. It is also nearly certain in its remedial effects, and will always cure when cures are possible. Call at Cascheer & Matheny's and get a memorandum book giving more full details of the curative properties of this wonderful medicine. 1-1y

Local and Miscellaneous

—The more boisterous portion of our republicans had a "high old time" last Tuesday night. Their yelling and howling was simply outrageous and hardly showed the first qualities of civilization. The crowd consisted mostly of boys, whose parents did not know of their whereabouts. The instruments used for the occasion were cow-bells, sleigh-bells, toy horns and a marshal band, led by ten torch-lights in the hands of boys from ten to sixteen years of age. The performance throughout would have been a disgrace to an inmate of the county house, let alone Garfield. They marched up one street and down the other, making night hideous with their whoops and yells, showing no respect whatever for the sick or having any regard for the quietude and peace of our citizens.

—Among our manufacturing establishments there are none in which the people of DeKalb county should feel more interested than in the Auburn Foundry and Machine Shops. This foundry was started but a few months since by the Morrell Bros. & Co., and has already built up a business of considerable proportions, which bids fair to become an enterprise which will be a credit to our town. The proprietors are clever and accommodating gentlemen, and worthy of a liberal patronage. Farmers wanting any kind of casting or repairing done should bear in mind that they can have it done here at home just as good and at prices as low as elsewhere. Their shops are near the Eel-River depot.

—Chris. Baldock has gone and done it. He was married to Miss. Katie Kapp, of Waterloo, this week, and now the happy pair are one. Won't it be interesting, in years to come, to hear those little Kapps cracking about that household, and calling "Papa." Chris. Baldock the head of a family; how's that? Well, Chris. is a good, clever fellow, with a heart in him as big as a barrel, and will make a good husband. His wife, Miss Katie, is a girl who has been raised well and knows how to perform the duties that go to make a home pleasant and attractive. With their many friends in this community we join in wishing them a happy, prosperous future.

—John Butler, a tramp, had seen better days. Finding himself hungry and destitute in St. Clair county, Ohio, he resolved to avenge himself upon those prosperous farmers who refused to feed him. Stealing a horses from a stable and some matches from a bar room, he rode away to perform his strange task. During a ride of two miles he set fire to seven barns, all of which were destroyed. The line of incendiarism would doubtless have extended much farther, had he not been promptly pursued. He was caught while kindling the eight fire. John was a good one.

—An item in the COURIER last week, copied from the Steuben Republican, stated that many persons would have attended the rally at this place from Angola, had not the company seen fit to make a change in time and then change back from the hour first announced. In behalf of the company, we will state that they did not change the time. The committee first fixed the time, and then changed it themselves, and afterwards had it changed back to the time first announced, upon the ground that if not done many would be left.

—Martin traded horses with a Newville fellow, last week, and gave $10 difference money—no, hold on. Gave $3 down and his note for $7. To keep speculators from getting excited perhaps it would be well for us to state that this note is not in the market. The horse was a peculiar one, and wouldn't work on the "gee line" worth a cent. Accordingly Mr. Martin took him back and got the note and his horse.

—The Kendallville Standard, of November 4, remarks: "Jesse Brumback, of Fairfield township had a ewe that gave birth to three lambs last spring, and they were weighed this fall and the four weighed 390 pounds—the lambs weighing 230 pounds, and the ewe 160 pounds. Mr. Brumback is one of the 'live' farmers of DeKalb county, and believes in raising good stock." Ewe are correct.

—Nick Ensley and L. Johnson made a contract that if Hancock was elected the former was to carry a torch in a democratic procession, and if Garfield was elected the latter was to march side by side with Mr. Ensley in a republican procession. Mr. Johnson appeared to fulfill his contract. Nick gazed at the crowd and then excused Mr. J., owing to a little "urgent" business he had to perform.

—We take pleasure in commending to the citizens of Auburn and DeKalb county, Mr. W. P. Harter—late of the firm of Root & Co., of Fort Wayne—who has purchased a half interest in the mammoth dry-goods and notion store of N. Ensley & Co. Mr. Harter will be pleased to make the acquaintance of our citizens, at the old stand, east of the public square.

—Attention is called to the new advertisement of the Fort Wayne Fruit House. They advertise Christmas goods and a reduction on sugars, coffee, teas, etc.

L. HARDING, President.

—Mr. James L. Ferguson, of the Columbia City Marble Works has sold to Mrs. George a granite monument to be erected over the grave of her husband, in Auburn cemetery. Parties wishing monuments or tombstones will find it to their interest to call on, or write to, Mr. Ferguson at Columbia City.

—A family from Noble county, in destitute circumstances, reached this place Sunday last, and owing to the severe snow storm were compelled to lay over. Some of our citizens donated quite freely to them in the way of food and garments. Buck Allen gave them quarters at his livery-barn and fed their horses.

—Some one should see that each church has a Christmas-tree. Its so much better for the children, you know. Some children wouldn't get anything at home, while on the other hand, they would get several articles could their parents have the display made at a public gathering.

—The ladies may consider themselves fortunate in having a gentleman of long experience and good taste to supply the Auburn market with fancy dress goods of the very latest styles. We allude to Mr. Harter, the new member of the firm of N. Ensley & Co.

—Saturday night and Sunday brought to this section of Hoosierdom a heavy fall of snow—in fact more than we had at any one time last winter. If the roads had been in a solid condition the jingle of the merry sleigh-bell could have been heard far and near.

—Now that cold weather has set in the head of each family should see that the chimneys are in safe condition. Nine-tenths of all the fires originate from defective flues, and with a little effort a great many buildings could be saved.

—The second division of the M. E. society will give a corn social, at the lecture room, on Wednesday evening. The refreshments will consist of corn-bread, pudding, cake, etc. All are respectfully invited.

—Now that the excitement incident to the election has subsided, we desire to look more after the local affairs of the county, and hope our correspondents will send us in the news of their sections each week.

—The horse disease, now so common throughout the country, has reached this community, and it is rumored that many horses are suffering with it. Several horses at our livery barns are victims.

—Harly Bumpus gets the republican pole for removing it. That cane pole at the top will make splendid fire wood. Who is the lucky man to get the democratic pole? It will make boss wood.

—With the change in the proprietorship of the dry-goods, millinery and notion store of N. Ensley & Co., comes a new and well-selected stock of all kinds of goods kept in that establishment.

—And now the young lady sits close to the window and tries hard to get "fancy touches" worked upon her fellow's slipper in time to have them dangle upon the Sunday-school Christmas-tree.

—The following is a list of unclaimed letters remaining in the postoffice, at Auburn, Ind., Nov. 8, 1880: Nettie Barnes, Howard Flinn, Carmon Fisher, and Mary Peck.

JOS. RAINIER, P. M.

—We authorize the authorities to put a muzzle on Chris. Baldock's dorg. He chased a rural chap all over Cedar street, last Tuesday—the dog was about thirty yards ahead of him.

—A new line of ladies' dolmans, a better quality than has ever before been handled in the Auburn market, is now open for inspection at Ensley & Co's. dry-goods and notion store.

—Considering the "fact" that the republicans are strict temperance men, it seems a little singular that so many "howcomeyouso" fellows have been celebrating at the republican jubilee.

—Jim Culbertson sold his residence on Jackson street last week to Mr. T. J. Cuppy for $1,150. Everybody, we suppose, understands what the latter gentleman wants a house for.

—Fred. Davis is now a regular clerk in the pioneer hardware store. He is a clever fellow, good-looking, and we see no reason why he cannot soon rank among the best in his calling.

—A beastly case of intoxication lay at the side door of an Eight street saloon Tuesday last. He was a man well along in years and proved to be an object of pity to each passer-by.

—Several parties east of town are investing a little money in law over a ditch. Moses Brandon is interested on one side of the question and he's a hard one to buck against.

—Dave Hampton has the foundation laid and will eventually raise a heavy beard. He wants to get the strength of Sampson, probably, and turn their boat right-side-up.

—Chris. Baker, the express man, has traded for Charley Picker's wagon. "I fly."

—Another teamster has moved to the city. There is pretty near enough here now.

—Dr. Sears and lady have gone to house-keeping. They live over the bank.

—The plasters finished their work at John Leasure's new residence Wednesday.

—A tile ditch is being put down on Fifth street, in rear of Al. Robbins' residence.

—Lute Wright, L. Bowers, Dr. Ford and others are now hunting for quail. It's fine sport.

—Rev. P. J. Ward, of South Whitley, will preach at the Baptist church Tuesday evening.

—Don't try to get along without a clock, when Abright will sell you one for two dollars.

—The practice of swinging on the gate is now abandoned until the return of the autumn days.

—Frank Leas has a new scheme to raise money for the band boys. Give it encouragement.

—We notice a number of loads of stave bolts going toward the factory of Beugnot & Co.

—The wheat fields do not look as promising as they generally do this time of the year.

—M. L. Duck has moved with his family to Garrett, where he will carry on the furniture business.

—Young ladies who have no matrimonial contracts should remember that leap-year will soon be over.

—Dod Lanning is behind with his corn-husking and wants to employ a hundred experienced hands.

—Mr. E. Baker is putting down a substantial sidewalk in front of his residence on north Main street.

—Frank Strebe is building new chimneys on his residence. Its cold at the north end of Van Buren street.

—Who is fattening our Thanksgiving turkey? We ain't particular about it weighing over fourteen pounds.

—Abright will have the finest display of silver-plated ware next week, that ever came to DeKalb county.

—Mrs. John Gross will spend the winter in Ohio, and Miss Ella will make her home with Mrs. Puffenberger.

—Arbuckle's Ariosa roasted coffee. Anchor roasted coffee at McQuiston & Ralston's. 46-3w.

—Mrs. Durkee and daughter, Miss Meleska, will shortly leave Auburn, to make their home at Defiance, Ohio.

—How much longer are those stands to disgrace the appearance of our court yard? Remove the lumber and boxes soon.

—Harry Weamer, late editor of the Republican, has leased the Butler Record and will take charge of the same to-day.

—Tom. Meegan has retired from the Fort Wayne Sunday Mail. W. J. Fowler, his partner, will continue its publication.

—T. H. Leasure, better known as Tom Hay, who has been in the mercantile business at Mt. Ayr, Iowa, is expected home soon.

—Abright the jeweler comes to the front with the finest display of gold and silver watches to be found in northern Indiana.

—Mr. Wm. A. Shreve will have a sale of personal property, at his place four miles east of Auburn, Saturday, November 27, 1880.

—Miss Frank Baker, who has been ailing for some time, was taken suddenly worse Sunday, and is now in a very critical condition.

—"Sellers' Liver Pills" stand unrivaled in the United States for curing biliousness, sick headache, etc. Ask your druggist for them.

—Empty houses are very scarce in the city. Men who have money could not make any better investment than to erect several dwellings.

—John Ashley will have the fun of wheeling Frank Leas, on a wheelbarrow, from the Eel-river depot up town Saturday afternoon at 4 o'clock.

—B. K. Rush, whom the boys know as "Kenny," and who has been pegging away at the anvil in the far west, is expected home next week.

—Mr. Hannen, of Garrett, is doing good work with our band, and before a great while Auburn can boast of one of the best bands in the state."

—A young man of much(?) logic may always be known, by poking his nose into investigating crowds and telling what he knows, unsolicited.

—General Hancock's majority in Hancock county is 566—being a gain of 89, on the vote for Landers in October last.

—Messrs. Ensley & Co. will continue to handle the latest styles and most complete assortment of millinery goods in this market.

—The holiday season is approaching, and it now behooves the young man to lay away his dimes, and see that his Sarah Jane has her annual present.

—Everybody admits, after trying them, that Rinehart's Liver Pills are the best. Only one for a dose. Sample dose free. Ask your druggist for them.

—Marriage license have been issued this week to John Welch and Emma Zimmerman, Julius Marsh and Minnie Gragg, John Kevialtkoski and Mary Noweska.

—Mr. and Mrs. Daniel Altenburg availed themselves of the excursion rates, over the Wabash, and started last Tuesday for a visit to Little Rock, Arkansas.

Accident on the B. & O. Road.

Saturday evening, about dark, freight train No. 18, going west, ran into a wild train standing on the track near the elevator, a half mile east of the junction. The engine and caboose were both badly wrecked, and the wood part of the engine took fire and was consumed. The engineer saw the empending danger in time to jump, and escaped uninjured. The fireman, Pat Catlin, of Garrett, had both legs crushed and was badly burned. He was taken home and died within fifteen minutes after reaching there.

THE WINE OF SUMMER.

BY BEN DE HOUSE.

The sun toward the south has rolled,
  The shades of autumn follow,
The butternut, like burnished gold,
  Shines in the shaded hollow.

The stately pines, the forest's pride
  Stand sentry-like in manner,
The maple on the mountain side
  Hangs out its scarlet banner.

Upon the walls the ivy shows
  A net of crimson tangles,
Along the road the fireweed glows
  Within the fences' angles.—

The sumach with its flaming leaves
  A blazing bush is burning,
The plowman where late stood the sheaves
  The mellow mold is turning.

The hawk, that in the early spring
  Swooped from the sky's blue chamber,
Now hangs aloft on pulseless wing,
  A speck within the amber.

With lazy wing his way on high
  A cawing crow is flapping,
A silhouette against the sky
  In sombre color mapping.

The quail's queer call is faintly heard
  From out the browning stubble,
A breeze the thistledown has stirred—
  The snowflake's ghostly double.

The rabbits, in their hodden-gray,
  Life to the landscape lending,
Like moving shadows seem to play
  With sward of autumn blending.

Where gleams the ambient autumn light
  Athwart the opening reaches,
The purple pigeon's flashing flight
  Is seen among the beeches.

Within the deeper shade is heard
  The beechnut's rain-like patter,
The song of some belated bird,
  The squirrel's laughing chatter.

Between the leaves the lambent light
  Its way to earth is threading,
Where forest shadows hint of night,
  A golden patchwork spreading.

I see through the shim'ring autumn haze
  O'er all a mellow gleaming,
And find in Indian-summer days
  A time for day-light dreaming.

Too indolent to even think,
  All thoughts unwelcome comers,
As in a walking dream I drink
  The wine of ripened summers.

THE ORDEAL OF LOVE.

Adolphe and Celeste were lovers—the course of true love never did run smooth, and it was interrupted in theirs by cruel parents, who had different views for their children. Adolphe, in despair, takes poison, but the invention of stomach-pumps prevented his desperate purpose, and he recovers. Celeste had the poison in her hand, and was in the act of raising it to her lips when her mother discovers her. The story thus proceeds;

Whatever the exaggerations of our lovers, they loved fervently, disinterestedly, and with all their hearts. Not one in ten thousand loves is so strong, or promises to be so lasting.

Adolphe did not die—antidotes were given in time—he recovered. The illness of Celeste was more dangerous. She suffered, poor child, a delirious fever, and it was several weeks before her life and reason were restored.

No parents could stand all this; ordinary caprices it is very well to resist, but when young people take to poison and delirious fevers—il faut ceder. Besides, such events derange one's comforts. One is always glad to come to terms when one begins to be annoyed with one's self. The old people then made it up, and the young people married.

As the bridegroom and Celeste were convinced that the sole object of life was each other's company, they hastened at once to the sweet solitudes of the country. They had a charming villa and beautiful garden; they were both accomplished, clever, amiable, young, and in love. How was it possible they should be susceptible to ennui? They could never bear to loose sight of each other.

"Ah, Adolphe—traitor—where hast thou been?"

"Merely shooting in the woods, my angel."

"What, and without me? Fie! Promise this shall not happen again."

"Ah, dearest, too gladly I promise."

Another time:

"What, Celeste! three hours have I been seeking for you! Where have you hid yourself?

"Don't look so angry, my Adolphe; I was only directing the gardener to build a little arbor for you to read in. I meant it as a surprise."

"My own Celeste! three hours—it is an eternity without you! Promise not to leave me again, without telling me where to find you."

"My own dearest Adolphe! how I love you—may my company be ever as dear to you."

This mode of life is very charming with many for a few days. Adolphe and Celeste loved each other so entirely that it lasted several months. What at first was passion had grown habit, and each blamed the other for want of affection, if he or she ever indulged in the novelty of different pursuits.

As they had nothing to do but to look at those faces they had thought so handsome, so it was now and then difficult not to yawn; and of late there had been little speeches like the following:

"Adolphe, my love, you never talk to me—put down that odious book you are always reading."

"Celeste, my angel, you don't hear me. I am telling you about my travels, and you gape in my face."

"My dear Adolphe, I am so exceedingly sleepy."

One morning, as Adolphe woke and turned in his bed, his eyes rested on his wife, who was still asleep—"Bless me," thought he, "I never saw this before—let me look again—yes, certainly she has—a wart on her chin!"

Adolphe rose and dressed himself—Adolphe was grave and meditative. They met at breakfast—the bride and bridegroom. Celeste was in high spirits; Adolphe was sombre and dejected.

"Let us ride to-day," said Celeste.

"My dear, I have a headache."

"Poor child! well, then let us read the new poem."

"My dear, you talk so loud."

"I!" and Celeste gazing reproachfully on Adolphe, perceived for the first time something in his eye that surprised her. She looked again—"Good heavens!" she said to herself, "Adolphe squints!"

It is impossible to say what an effect this fatal discovery had on Adolphe. He thought of it incessantly. He had nothing else to complain of—but then warts on the chin are certainly not becoming. Celeste's beauty had improved greatly since her marriage. Everybody else saw the improvement. Adolphe saw nothing but the wart upon her chin. Her complexion was more brilliant, her form more perfect, her walk more majestic; but what is all this, when one has a wart on the chin? The wart seemed to grow bigger and bigger every day—to Adolphe's eye it threatened speedily to absorb the whole face! Nay, he expected in due time to see his beautiful Celeste all wart! He smothered his pain as well as he could, because he was naturally well-bred and delicate; and no woman likes to be told of the few little blemishes she is blind to herself. He smothered his pain, but he began to think it would be just as well to have separate rooms.

Meanwhile, strange to say, Adolphe's squint grew daily more decided and pronounced. "He certainly did not squint before we were married," thought Celeste; "it is very unpleasant—it makes one so fidgety to be stared at by a person who sees two ways—and Adolphe has unfortunately a habit of staring. I think I might venture to hint, delicately and kindly, that the habit can't yet be incurable."

As wives are always first in the emulation of fault-finding, Celeste resolved to hazard the hint on the first favorable opportunity.

"Well, my Celeste, I have brought my dog to see you," said Adolphe, one morning.

"He! down, down! Pray turn him out; see the mark of his paws. I can't bear dogs, Adolphe."

"Was that to me, or the dog?" asked Celeste.

"Oh! to him, to be sure."

"I beg your pardon, my dear, but I thought you looked at me. Indeed, Adolphe, if truth may be said, you have lately contracted a bad habit—you are getting quite a cast in your eye."

"Madame!" said Adolphe, prodigiously offended, and hurrying to the glass.

"Don't be angry, my love; I would not have mentioned it if it did not get worse every day; it is yet time to be cured, I am sure; just put a wafer on the top of your nose, and you will soon see straight."

"A wafer on the top of my nose! Much better put one at the top of your chin, Celeste."

"My chin?" cried Celeste, running in turn to the glass. "What do you mean, sir?"

"Only that you have a very large wart there, which it would be more agreeable to conceal."

"Sir?"

"Madame!"

"A wart on my chin, monster!"

"A cast in my eye, fool!"

"Yes! How could I ever love a man who squinted!"

"Or I a woman with a wart on her chin!"

"Sir, I shall not condescend to notice your insults. No wonder—you can't see! I pity your infirmity."

"Madam, I despise your insinuations; but since you deny the evidence of your own glass, suffer me to send for a physician, and if he can cure your deformity, so much the better for you."

"Yes, send for a physician; he will say whether you squint or not. Poor Adolphe! I am not angry; no, I pity so melancholy a defect."

The doctor could not very well see whether Adolphe squinted, for he had his hat over his eyes; besides, he prudently thought it best to attend to one alady at a time.

"As for the wart, sir," said he, "it is not difficult to cure."

"But if my wife don't confess that she has it, she will never consent to be cured. I would not mind if she would but own to it. Oh, the vanity of women!"

"It must have been after some absence that this little defect was perceived by you—"

"After absence—we have not been a day separated since we married."

Celeste burst into tears. Adolphe, in a rage, seized his hat, mounted his horse and went himself to the doctor.

The doctor was a philosopher as well as a physician. He took his pony and ambled back with Adolphe. On his way he extracted from Adolphe his whole history, for men in a passion are easily made garrulous. "The perfidious women!" said Adolphe. "Would you believe it?—we braved everything for each other—never were two persons so much in love—nay, we attempted suicide rather than endure a longer separation. I renounced the most brilliant marriage for her sake—too happy that she was mine without a dowry—and now she declares I squint. And, oh, she has such a wart on her chin!"

"O-ho," thought the doctor, sinking into a revery—I have said he was a philosopher—but it did not require much philosophy to know that persons who would have died for each other only a few months ago were not alienated only by a wart or a cast in the eye.

They arrived at Adolphe's villa—they entered the saloon. Celeste no longer wept; she had put on her most becoming cap, and had the air of an insulted but uncomplaining wife.

"Confess to the wart, Celeste, and I'll forgive all," said Adolphe.

"Nay, why so obstinate as to the caste of the eye; I shall not admire you less (though others may), if you will not be so vain as to disown it."

"Enough, madam; doctor, regard that lady, is not the wart monstrous?—can it be cured?"

"Nay," cried Celeste, sobbing, "look rather at my poor husband's squint. His eyes were so fine before we married."

The doctor put on his spectacles; he regarded the first one and then the other.

"Sir," said he deliberately, "this lady has certainly a pimple on the left of her chin considerably smaller than a pin's head. And, madam, the pupil of your husband's right eye is like that of nine persons in ten, the hundredth part of an inch nearer the nose than the pupil of the left. This is the case, as it appears to me, seeing you both for the first time. But I do not wonder that you, sir, think the pimple so enormous; and you, madam, the eye so distorted, since you see each other every day!"

The pair were struck by a secret conviction; when an express arrived breathless to summon Adolphe to his father, who was taken ill. At the end of three months Adolphe returned. Celeste's wart had entirely disappeared, and Celeste found her husband's eye as beautiful as ever.

Taught by experience, they learned then, that warts rapidly grow on chins and squints rapidly settle upon eyes, that are too constantly seen. And that it is easy for two persons to die joyfully together when lovers, but prodigiously difficult without economizing the presence, to live comfortably together when married.

Hints to Stammerers.

I commenced operations by writing out a very large number of ordinary sentences as they presented themselves. Having examined these sentences one by one, and knowing well where I should fail in uttering them as they stood, I sought to devise some method by which these consonant initials might be got rid of, or, at all events, diminished. It struck me that if I could contrive, by any artificial division of the words composing each sentence, to bring the consonants at the end of a division, instead of at the commencement, a grand object would be thus achieved—for consonants at the end of a word present no special difficulty; the glottis having been already opened by the preceding vowel sound, the terminating consonant flows out almost as a matter of course. It is as when we pour liquid from a full bottle. At first it runs intermittently, with a "gluk-gluk," but when once enough of the liquid is out to admit the air freely the obstruction ceases. In a similar way the object of the stammerer is to prevent the glottis from closing when once it is opened. To ascertain whether or not my idea was practicable, I wrote out in the ordinary way one sentence at a time. I then rewrote this sentence, not divided into simple words, but making every initial consonant the final letter of the preceding word. Having divided the words composing the sentence I then read them over aloud many times, according to this artificial division, to try if they were pronounceable without any gross peculiarity. I practiced this method incessantly, both in reading and colloquial speaking, and, to my astonishment, I discovered within a few weeks that I was wielding an instrument which was almost invariably successful; and with this consciousness of increased power my confidence daily increased, so that I could frequently speak without regard to any method. All who had known me up to this time were perfectly astounded, and anxiously inquired by what means so remarkable a change had been effected; for mine, be it observed, was no mere occasional hesitation, but a most habitual, unmistakable, and inveterate stammering. Shortly after this change I had numerous transactions, which involved a large amount of talking, with a gentleman occupying a somewhat superior position; and, being anxious to know whether the working of my mental machine was at all observable to outsiders, I asked him whether he had ever observed any peculiarity in my speaking. His reply was: "No; only that you speak very distinctly."—Chambers' Journal.

The Game of Boston.

The game at cards called "Boston," says a late writer in the New York Times, after the capital of Massachusetts, and much played by our forefathers, has lately been revived, it is said, in New England and in New York, especially here, and is greatly enjoyed on account of the skill required for proficiency. Boston is played by four persons with two packs of cards, which are never shuffled. One of the packs is dealt and the other cut alternately, to determine the trump, the trump governing the game. The dealer deals five cards to each player twice, and deals six cards the last time around. If the first player can make, or thinks he can make five tricks from his hand, he says: "I go Boston," and his fellow-players may overbid him with the words: "I go 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12 or 13," as the hand of each may justify. Should any one fail to make the number of tricks he bids for, he must pay to each competitor a forfeit, regulated by a scale of prices agreed upon beforehand. The agreement is imperative; without it the game is impossible. It is accounted the most complex and difficult of all games at cards, and is therefore a favorite with professional gamblers. Boston has been played in France and England, where it is often spoken of as the American game. Benjamin Franklin has the reputation of introducing it in Paris. He gave it the name of his native city, and is said to have been a very clever player. The philosophers of the eighteenth century, who were his companions in France, were very fond of the game and delighted in its novelty. Baron d'Holbach is reported to have said that only a man of genius could excel at Boston. The game has always been played more or less in the Southwest, where much money is still lost and won by it.

Hope.

"Eternal Hope" is, perhaps, the most logical tenet of the the three, for it so attaches escape from pain to the presence of penitence and tendencies to righteousness that it seems to render salvation less easy than it is rendered by the Universalism which forces heaven upon all by a law of redemption or progress. This "hope" is only for the soul that has not become the perfect slave of sin. To those who may have gone down to the grave from pagan lands or from places where no moral light has shone; to persons who, amid clouds of skepticism, have still sought after God if haply they might find Him; to those whose sins have brought many penitential tears in this life; to those who have relied upon morality and benevolence, not holding the fact or quality of a church or an atonement; to those who have died too young to have sounded fully the duties of life; and to an untold throng not found in any category but made by the Omniscient, comes this divine form of hope, walking through the shadows of the lost world just as sweetly as she walks through the misfortunes of this career. Hope moves all over our earth. The young and the old see her; the sick hear her garments rustle in the air that come into the open window, see her in the flowers by their bed; the farmer sees her moving over his field like a Camilla; the student smiles at the touch of her wand; the lover and the poet create a universe out of the material, rich and beautiful, she heaps at their feet. This same hope Farrar and his school behold walking to and fro in the dark land beyond the flood, offering her hand forever and forever to all those beings which contain a rational mind and a penitent, sensitive heart.—Prof. David Swing.

Pecuniary Independence.

We talk a great deal about our political, intellectual, moral and social independence; all the world has heard us talk about them. We do not enjoy them as fully, perhaps, as we think. How much independence of thought has the journalist, for instance, who must bid for an audience, the author whose first thought must be never to displease a reader, the orator who must repeat the stock notions of his hearers, the professor who has to reconcile evolution with theology; how much liberty of action has the voter who depends upon a Government salary, or who is in a politician's employ? One cannot very seriously blame these people, to whom independence often means starvation. What I want to set in clear light is this: that independence in life and thought depends, more than we like to believe, upon pecuniary independence; it is not to be had by wishing merely. Individuals there are, and always will be, who will suffer for their moral or intellectual independence; but the communities will be what circumstances make them. This, again, I want to set in clear light: that we are, as a community, deficient, in spite of all our national wealth, and unnecessarily deficient, in the best part of independence—the power to enjoy our lives. In this respect we are behind our friends in France, with their 2,000,000 of people living upon their incomes.

These 2,000,000 of people are not, for the most part, either idle, or frivolous, or wealthy people. Many of them live in the cities, but more of them are quiet people, living on their modest properties in the country, and enjoying their competence in a rational way—enjoying friendships, social pleasures, family affections, and all the kindly observances of home life in a way that we have little idea of—in a way that the tourist in Paris sees nothing of. We have much to learn from the French, and among the things that we have to learn are some that may surprise us. One of these things is the comfort, the unity, and the permanence of French homes. The French home and family, their happiness, their unity, their permanence, these have been developed by the combined industry, thrift, and domestic sentiment of the most intelligent people in Europe, and especially by its great middle class. We have the significant testimony of Prince Bismarck "that the French nation has a social solidity such as no other nation of Europe enjoys." And Mr. Matthew Arnold, from whose "Mixed Essays" I quote, adds: "This can only come from the broad basis of well-being, and of cause for satisfaction with life, which in France, more than in other countries, exists." If we had 2,000,000 of people, or 1,000,000, who were enjoying a competence, earned or inherited, can it be doubted that we should be a happier people, and a better one, than we are? France and the United States have this important feature in common—in each country nearly one-half of the people live directly by agriculture; but our country homes and families have not attained the comfort or the permanence of theirs.—T. M. Coan, in Harper's Magazine.

Distressing Condition of the Russian Peasantry.

The Russian correspondent of the Temps sends a frightfully-vivid description of the demoralization, the drunkenness, the misery, and poverty of the Russian people. His accounts are fully confirmed by a series of articles in the Golos. The Russian writer doubts whether the peasantry have been gainers—whether they have advanced in civilization—since their emancipation in 1861. Assuredly they are no longer sold like cattle; their children are no longer taken from them; they are not flogged, nor are they subject to the discretionary arbitrary power of the noble or his bailiff. Nor are they driven in herds to work for him five or six days in the week. But they have less land, less wood, less credit than before. The landlords, their owners, formerly protected them against the police, who now pounce upon them for various kinds of imposts unknown to them before. Then they had but one master; now they are subject to the Mayor, to the tax-gatherer, to the Chief of the Commune, to the tribunal of Zemstvos, to the Judge, and to other functionaries. Against their exactions, arbitrary and frequently illegal, they have no appeal. With their vaunted self-government they have less security and order than before. All the hopes which were raised by their emancipation have been dispelled; they have fallen into apathetic discouragement, all because they who are charged with the administration of affairs are not animated with the Czar's liberal intentions. After having granted a somewhat too-extensive autonomy, the authorities sought to impede its development. The rural police and other functionaries were invested with arbitrary powers to impose fines and penalties. Additional vexations restrictions were imposed in 1874, and the disheartened peasantry, seeing the hopelessness of their plight, have fallen into the most degraded drunkenness and its attendant misery. Multitudes who were well-to-do peasants have seen all swept away from them—their cattle, their homes, and all; they now grovel like the beasts of the field, where shelter can be found. M. Kochelef, the author of these articles, insists that the state must begin by enforcing agricultural improvements; the moral and intellectual development of the peasantry would follow, were the tribunals to be reorganized so that the peasant could have confidence in the integrity of his arbitrators.

Filtering Cistern Water.

Ex-Mayor Clymer, of Reading, Pa., proposes the following, which is probably the best cheap mode of fitting rain-water for drinking or culinary purposes:

"Pure fresh water in the West is secured the year round by their large and admirable cisterns, built of brick and Roman cement. In the center is placed a brick chimney; in said chimney the pump is placed. The water from the top to the bottom of the cistern is constantly filtering through the chimney to supply the demands of the pump, and this process keeps the water in the main body of the cistern in a state of constant agitation, thereby it is always sweet and good. Every family can have pure water by filtering the rain of heaven from their housetops, or by filtering the impure water from our 'water basins.'"

Vegetine Cured His Daughter.

CALLIERSVILLE, Chilton Co., Ala.,
May 18, 1878.

Dear Sir—My daughter has been afflicted with nasal catarrh, affection of bladder and kidneys, and is of scrofulous diathesis, and, after having exhausted my skill and the most eminent physicians of Selma, I at last resorted to the use of your VEGETINE (without confidence), and, to my great surprise, my daughter has been restored to health. I write this as a simple act of justice, and not as an advertising medium.
Respectfully, T. E. CALLIER, M. D.

HARRIS REMEDY CO. MF'G CHEMISTS, Market and 8th Streets, ST. LOUIS, MO.

Unsolicited testimony to the Efficacy of Prof. Harris' Seminal Pastilles, taken from Letters received from Patrons:

Indiana, April 11th, 1879.—The remedy is working perfectly. Had epilepsy from weakness, for eight years past.

Chicago, Aug. 14, 1879.—I am thoroughly cured and feel tip top. The young man in the country is getting better.

Missouri, Sept. 18, 1879.—I received so much benefit from the use of your remedies that I want to try them in another case. This is of long standing, and will need something very strong.

Mich., Jan. 23, 1879.—I have used up your package of medicine; send me another as soon as possible. That package stopped all apparent trouble, but there is a weakness yet, and I wish you would prepare this lot for the cure of that.

Iowa, Oct. 10th, 1879.—I am almost surprised at your Pastilles. They have worked like a charm on me. I am just twice as much of a man as I was before taking. I was on the verge of the grave, I thought, and there was no cure for me, but now I am in good hopes of a cure.

West Virginia, Aug. 29, 1879.—I received your medicine, and I believe it has cured me, for which I am very thankful. Enclosed please find $5, for which please send me another box (No. 2) for a friend. You have done a great thing for me. I will send you all the orders I can.

From a Physician and Surgeon.

Missouri, June 20th, 1879.—Please forward me at once another box of the Pastilles. The patient on whom I have used most of one box, in addition to a sample box, is fast recovering, and I think another will set him all right.

From a Druggist.

Maryland, Sept. 2, 1879.—Last January we got from you a box of your remedy, for one of our customers, and it has made a perfect cure of him. We have another customer now suffering in the same way, and wish by return mail one No. 2 box.

AMUSEMENT NOTES.

MISS EMILY FAITHFUL will not visit us this season.

"WANTED—A new husband," Mrs. Oates.

CAL. WAGNER said Cincinnati was not like Paris and the Cincinnatians hissed him.

SARA BERNHARDT took the "h" from her first name and placed it in the middle of her second.

THEODORE THOMAS conducted the first chorus rehearsal of the Cincinnati Musical Festival Association, for the May festival which takes place in 1882.

OLIVE LOGAN, writing from London, says that the music hall song, Oh, Mary Ann, Fie for Shame; I Tell Your Ma! is all the rage there now.

THE custom-house officers in New York carefully inspect the inside of fishing rods. Sarah Bernhardt can't slip into the country in that fashion.

A PITTSBURG paper says that Mary Anderson is billed to play in New York for five weeks in December. It takes the handsome Mary to spin out time.

MISS ANNA DICKINSON announces an intention of returning to the lecture platform, but will still prosecute her various dramatic projects, lecturing on Danton and giving readings from her play, Aurelian.

A NEW star in New York is Lillian Spencer, and she is only 16 or 17 years old. She is a little thing no bigger than Lotta. But she has a voice that was moulded for tragedy. Her career promises to be an interesting one.

"WELL, what do you think of X.'s new five-act tragedy?" "Hum! There were five of us in our box, not bad judges of a play as judges go, and we all agreed that one act should have been omitted." "Indeed! Which act?" "Well, no two of us agreed on that point."

A STATEMENT published in this country that "the whole performance of the Passion Play at Oberammergau has been so deteriorated and vulgarized that, after this year, no representation of it is to be allowed," is totally and unequivocally denied in the Munich papers.

ALL that the American public knows of Sarah Bernhardt is that she is an extravagant woman, both in purse and character, lean to boniness, on the shady side of five and thirty, capricious, unreliable, a shrewd dabbler in the arts, who has made a vast success by clever puffery of herself.—Brooklyn Eagle.

THE moment the death of Miss Neilson was known the vigilant police of Paris sealed the doors of her room at the Hotel Continental. After the investigation the seals were broken and it was found that the window leading to the piazza was open all the time, and any one walking on the outside could easily have stepped into the room. The sealing process doesn't seem to have been worth a continental.

THE beautiful play, Hazel Kirke, which will be performed at the Madison Square Theater to-night for the 253d time, has won the laurels, having accomplished the longest run on record. It is probable that Hazel Kirke will be played through the present season, as there seems no signs of abatement in the attendance, and, like Tennyson's Brook, it looks as if it will go on forever.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

THE musical festival to take place in New York City in May, 1881, will undoubtedly be the grandest musical event ever held in this country. Some idea may be formed of the vastness of the undertaking when it is understood that the estimated expense is some $70,000, about one-half of which is already subscribed. The chorus, which has been successfully organized, numbers nearly twelve hundred carefully selected voices—the Oratorio Society section of 400 men, in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association; another New York section of 200 meet at Trinity Chapel; the Newark section number 200; the Jersey City section 150, the Brooklyn section 150, and the Nyack section 100. All have weekly rehearsals.

Autumn Leaves.

AN effective method of decorating a wall or panel with autumn leaves is to cover the space to be ornamented with tulle, the meshes of which are as large as possible. This at a distance does not hide the painting or the paper on the wall, and it makes an excellent ground work on which the leaves and ferns can be pinned to form very ornamental designs. Picture scraps are excellent for decorative purposes. Small rooms, and nurseries, especially, papered with them and afterward varnished, afford great entertainment; cornices may be made of them to run around all the wall paper, with about two inches of gold roll between each, and a black bordering. Wooden fire-boards and Holland mats may also be covered with them; these mats should be varnished. Common garden flower-pots can be made ornamental by giving them a coat of paint and then painting on them landscapes, flowers or figures. If you cannot paint, the embossed picture scraps can be pasted on and afterward varnished. Bleached skeleton ferns may be laid on photograph book covers, wooden trays, and blotting books, and varnished. They look especially well on black painted wood; if laid close together they resemble an inlaying of ivory. A plain table with one drawer makes quite a pretty writing table by staining it black, and then laying the ferns on a border round the top and around the drawers. The ferns can also be applied to velvet frames, when the whole should be covered with white tulle of the finest and most invisible description. An elegant fireboard may be made in this way.

Horse-Meat as Food.

Some very interesting statistics have been published by the society for promoting the use of horse-flesh and the flesh of asses and mules as food, showing how steadily the consumption of these articles of diet has been increasing in Paris and the provinces since the foundation of the society in 1866. The weight has increased from 171,300 pounds in 1866 to 1,982,620 pounds in 1879. In the principal cities of the provinces the consumption of horse-flesh may be considered to have fairly taken root. At Marseilles, in 1869, there were 599 horses eaten; 1,031 in 1875, and 1,533 in 1878. At Nancy, 165 in 1873, over 350 in 1876, and 705 in 1878; at Rheims, 291 in 1874, 423 in 1876, and 384 in 1878; at Lyons, 1,319 in 1873, and 1,313 in 1875. In both the latter cases some difficulties had been thrown in the way by the town authorities, as was the case recently at Chalons-sur-Marne, where the Mayor placed the rate of horse-flesh at a higher rate than that of beef. The average price of horse-meat is from 25 to 30 cents per pound. Each horse furnishes about 200 kilogrammes (400 weight) of meat, which is capable of being prepared in many by no means unappetizing ways, such as pot-au-feu, boiled, roast, hashed, haricot, jugged, filet, etc.—Parisian.

Autumn Berries.

Charming winter bouquets can be made with autumn berries and grasses. Brightest and best is the climbing bitter-sweet, whose capsuled berries, of a brilliant, waxy scarlet, with coverings of orange, brighten not only their native hedge-rows and forests, but, transferred to the parlor mantel, light up as a miniature "burning bush," to which it is closely allied. Euonymus Americanus is a shrub, from two to five feet in height, called also bitter-sweet or burning bush, from its brilliant appearance in the early autumn. These berries once gathered are a "joy forever," as time has but little power to destroy their beauty. They lose, to be sure, much of their glossy freshness, but sufficient brilliancy of color remains to make them useful in filling up bouquets of grasses or grains. In and out among the flowery foliage of the woodbine hide the purple clusters of berries, swinging in their slender red stems. Next we find the black alder, as it is called. It is a native of our woodlands, a trim, upright shrub, of about eight feet in height, scarlet berries clinging all winter to the naked twigs. The native dog-wood, cordus stolonifera, are dotted over with a small, white berry, that we gather to relieve the blaze of our red clusters and bring out the shades of the purple woodbine. The American holly, with its glossy leaves, and the useful barberry, must not be forgotten. A few clusters of rose hips, though they lose much of their beauty in drying, and some of the little apple-like fruit, the thorn, will finish our collection for this time, except as we pass the old garden on our homeward way, where we stop for the beautiful white wax balls, called by some snowberry, symphoricarpus racemosus, that swing half the winter over the mossy garden wall. A half-hour spent in arranging our gleanings will add beauty to the unoccupied nooks and corners of the room, and repay us for our pleasant labor in gathering winter bouquets.

Something About Babies.

According to a Yorkshire notion, a new-born infant should be laid first in the arms of a maiden before any one touches it; and in some places the infant's right hand is left unwashed in order that he may gather riches. It is, too, considered very important by many that an infant should go up in the world before it goes down. Thus, in Cleveland, says Mr. Henderson, if a child should be born in the top story of a house, for want of a flight of stairs one of the gossips will take it in her arms and mount a table, chair or chest of drawers before she carries it down stairs. In the North of England, when an infant for the first time goes out of the house, it is presented with an egg, some salt and a little loaf of bread and occasionally a small piece of money—these gifts being supposed to insure that the child shall never stand in need of the common necessaries of life. In the East Riding of Yorkshire a few matches are added to light the child to heaven. It was, too, in former times, customary, and the practice is not yet obsolete, to provide a large cheese and cake and cut them at the birth of the child. These were called "the groaning cake and cheese," and were distributed among all the neighbors.

In Yorkshire this cake is termed the "pepper cakes" and in some localities the "sickening cake." It is the source of a species of divination, for, being cut into small pieces by the medical man, it is divided among the unmarried of the female sex, under the name of "dreaming bread." Each one takes a piece, places it on the foot of the left stocking and throws it over the right shoulder. This being done, they must retire to bed backward, without uttering a word, and those who are lucky enough to fall asleep before midnight are favored with a sight of their future husband in their dreams.

Growth of British Cities.

The opinion, quite generally entertained, that London is one of the few large British cities which grow rapidly, is very erroneous as the figures plainly show. It is nearly eight years since the last census, and the Registrar General consequently supplies various estimates, annually, of the population of the principal towns, founded on the ratio of increase between 1861 and 1871, in order to form a basis for calculation of yearly rates. From this it appears that London now contains 3,620,868, an increase since 1871 of 366,698; Liverpool, 538,338, an increase of 44,933; Manchester, 361,819, an increase of 10,640; Leeds, 311,860, an increase of 52,648; Sheffield, 297,138, an increase of 57,132; Bristol, 209,947, an increase of 27,335; Bradford, 191,046, an increase of 45,216; Hull, 146,347, an increase of 24,455; Salford, 177,849, an increase of 53,048; Newcastle, 146,948, an increase of 18,505; Portsmouth, 131,821, an increase of 18,262; Leicester, 125,621, an increase of 30,402; Sunderland, 114,575, an increase of 26,383; Oldham, 111,318, an increase of 28,689. London is equal to eighteen of the largest cities; Liverpool and Glasgow are very near one another in population; the latter having 31,818 more people than the former. The density of population varies greatly in the leading towns. For example, it is 11.4 in Norwich; Newcastle, 27.4; Sunderland, 41.4; London, 48.0; Manchester, 84.3; and Liverpool, 103.3 per acre. Many of the small uncommercial towns of Great Britain are stationary, others slowly decline.—N. Y. Times.

A MAN 65 years old has been found in Harrington, Me., who has been out of the State only once, has been on a steamboat only once, and never was in a city until he visited Portland, which he "reckoned wasn't much of a place for farms."

The Last of the Vespucci.

A decided sensation was created at Washington during the Van Buren administration by the appearance there of a handsome and well-educated Italian lady who called herself America Vespucci, and claimed descent from the navigator who gave his name to this continent. Ex-President Adams and Daniel Webster became her special friends, and she was soon a welcome guest in the best society. In a few weeks after her arrival she presented a petition to Congress asking, first, to be admitted to the rights of citizenship, and secondly, to be given "a corner of land" out of the public domain of the country which bore the name of her ancestor. An adverse report, which was soon made, is one of the curiosities of Congressional literature. It eulogized the petitioner as "a young, dignified, and graceful lady, with a mind of the highest intellectual culture, and a heart beating with all our own enthusiasm in the cause of America and human liberty." The reasons why the prayer of the petitioner could not be granted were given, but she was recommended to the generosity of the American people. "The name of America—our country's name—should be honored, respected and cherished in the person of the interesting exile from whose ancestor we derive the great and glorious title." A subscription was immediately opened by Mr. Haight, the Sergeant-at-Arms of the Senate, and Judges, Congressmen and citizens vied with one another in their contributions. Just then it was whispered that Mad. Vespucci had borne an unenviable reputation at Florence and at Paris, and had been induced by a pecuniary consideration to break off an intimacy with the Duke of Orleans, Louis Phillippe's oldest son, and come to Washington. Soon afterward the Duke's younger brother, the Prince de Joinville, came to this country and refused to recognize her, which virtually excluded her from reputable society. For some years subsequently she resided in luxurious seclusion with a wealthy citizen of New York, in the interior of that State, and after his death she returned to Paris.—Atlantic Monthly.

One Hundred Lashes on the Bare Back.

M. S. Root, of this city, a gentleman whose veracity will not be questioned in this community, gives us the following statement of a scene which he witnessed a short time since in the eastern portion of this county: "I was at Campo. An Indian had been found guilty of breaking into the house of Mr. Herrick and stealing some blankets. He was tried before Justice of the Peace Gaskill and turned over to the old Indian Alcalde and six chiefs for punishment. They sentenced him to receive 100 lashes. They were just getting ready to tie him up as I started for dinner, after putting out my team. The prisoner was a large young man, six feet high and well proportioned. He was tied up by the wrists with a long rope, and the rope was passed through the springs of a high seat on one side of a wagon and over the other side, the victim being drawn up so that his feet would just touch the ground. His feet was spread and each tied to the wagon-spokes, and his body was tied at the hips. His shirt was removed, and then a stalwart Indian administered the punishment with a leather lariat, by whirling it round his head and bringing it down with his utmost force upon the naked body of the prisoner. The blood poured from the writhing man's back. After a strong man had administered fifty strokes he was so exhausted by the task that he gave way for another fiend, a younger and more muscular Indian, who continued the infamous torture. Fifty lashes had already been laid on, and the young devil continued to cut into the flesh fifty times more. I spare a recital of the awful shrieks and cries of the poor tortured creature. When the 100 lashes had thus been administered, the Indian Alcalde told the almost-dying man to leave the country, or he would be hung if he ever came back. Mr. Gaskill says: 'After one of these Indians has been whipped once he will never steal again; it makes a "good Indian" of him.' This prisoner when let down fell to the ground, and could not move without support from his sister."—San Diego Union.

Having Fun With a Rattlesnake.

There was some excitement and much talk about the scientific enthusiasm of Dr. Stradling, surgeon on board the Royal Mail Company's steamer Elbe, who had horrified the crew and passengers of that vessel by testing upon himself the efficacy of an antidote for snake bite which he had discovered. At Bahia he succeeded in purchasing a large rattlesnake, which he conveyed on board surreptitiously, and, locking himself up in his cabin, deliberately made the snake bite him, with the result that he was found, some twelve hours after, in a state of coma, from which, however, he was recovered without much difficulty, and declared that for many hours the venom had been without effect upon him. Being remonstrated with by the Captain, Dr. Stradling promised "not to do it again." But it was too much for him, and at Rio Janeiro he went ashore one evening, leaving a letter to the effect that he "was going ashore to try his antidote, so as not to break his promise to the letter at all events; that he felt confident of success, but that they would know what had become of him in case he failed to return," etc. Of course this letter caused his friends on board much anxiety till next morning, when, just as they were sending off the police, Dr. Stradling appears, "radiant," showing a fresh bite in his arm, and declaring the experiment to have been perfectly successful, although he would not tell in what consisted the specific so marvelously effective.—Rio Janeiro letter.

The Cologne Cathedral.

Since 1821 the public and private contributions to the building fund of Cologne Cathedral have amounted to $4,500,000. Adding the contributions of past centuries, notably the money expended on the colossal foundations, a German paper find that as it now stands the cathedral represents about $10,000,000.

Conundrums.

Why are the glories of Greece like iron? Because they are o'er.

When is a bell like a tale related? When it is tolled (told).

Has time more than one head? Yes, judging from the number of people who declare either their watch or clock ahead of time.

Why is revenge like a poor debtor? Because it promises much and pays little or nothing.

Why are ministers bad mathematicians? Because they make the result of joining one and one, one.

Why is a man's foot like himself? Because it has a sole (soul).

Educational.

We would call the attention of School Boards and all interested in educational matters to the advertisement in this number of "Swinton's Supplementary Readers," designed to connect with any of the regular series of readers. The books are pure, elevating and instructive, while in typographical appearance and as specimens of the book-maker's art they are far in advance of anything we have seen in the school-book line. The fact that the series is published by Ivison, Blakeman, Taylor & Co. is a sufficient guaranty of their excellence.

Women at the Polls.

[Harper's Weekly.]

Colonel Higginson is reported to have said at the late convention for equal suffrage in Worchester that the failure of women to vote at the school elections showed that they did not care to vote, and that when they showed the wish, the right of suffrage would be granted. As a statement of the fact of the indisposition to vote, this remark is undoubtedly true. The number of women who wish to vote is very small, and, so far as our own observation extends, the diligent efforts of those who insist that they ought to wish to vote do not produce much effect. Yet it is unquestionably true that laws made by men exclusively have been often very unjust to women. A quarter of a century ago Mr. Gladstone denounced some such laws as a reproach to England and to civilization. But there is a constant amelioration of harsh laws, and despite the injustice it remains true that women at large are not greatly interested in the movement for their enfranchisement.

But because women who do not feel disfranchisement to be unjust are indifferent, shall those who do feel the injustice be denied the right? The question is much like that of all emancipation. It is not whether the individual slaves or any considerable number of them wish to be free, but whether slavery is not necessarily hurtful to the whole community. The principle of popular government is the participation of all intelligent adult citizens under equal conditions. How can a political community wisely contemn its fundamental principle even although the disregard does not threaten it with immediate disaster? Is not permanent disregard of conceded rights dangerously demoralizing? And what reason is there in the argument that a hundred persons who are qualified to do something, and desire to do it, should not be allowed to do it until a thousand who are equally qualified, but have no desire, shall change their minds?

The extension to women of the right of voting at school meetings in New York was evidently not the result of an overwhelming wish of the women of New York to vote at school meetings, as the elections of the 12th of October proved. The law was passed because there was no good reason against it. The legislature said that if Mrs. A., whose children went to school, and who was taxed to maintain it, wished to have a voice in the disposition of the money and the management of the school, she should not be debarred because Mrs B. thought it would be a great nuisance. We understand the difficulties. But the principle is sound that in a popular government the whole adul intelligence should take part. If women are competent to vote at school meetings, they cannot, on other questions involving the common interests of the sexes, be classed fairly with criminals and lunatics. This was the conviction of the people of New Jersey many years ago, and women were enfranchised and voted. The charming picture drawn for the Weekly by Mr. Howard Pyle, which appears in this number, is a glimpse of the quaint old times, and is in itself a pleasant argument. There is nothing disagreeable nor unwomanly in the expression of interest and preference which is indicated by casting the ballot in this drawing, and there is an intimation of the humanizing and refining influence which would result from the voting of women upon subjects in which they have a common concern with men—and influence which is felt in every fair association of men and women.

Outgrowing One's Friends.

There are men and women in public life whose pathway is marked by the "remains" of whilom friends whom they squeezed dry and dropped, like so many sucked oranges. In politics it is said of such a man that he has kicked down the ladder by which he climbed. In literary or other walks of life the human sponge often swells up with the thought that he has "outgrown" his humble friends of other days. In private life the self-conscious soul contents itself with becoming more and more the center of its little circumference, taking none within its orbit who will not consent to revolve around it and emit light and warmth for its enjoyment. There have been many noble definitions of what a friend is. People of real individuality, strength and sensitiveness doubtless have fewer real friends than they are apt to think, unless they have been cherishing, unconsciously, low ideals. But whatever a friend may not be, certainly that sweet and noble term is unmerited by one who, however generous in other directions, is selfish of himself.—Golden Rule.

Ex-senator Morrill, of Maine, says of Senator Hamlin: "He has never known sickness, and has been the most careful and attentive to his public duties, of whatever character, of any man in the country. He never wore a piece of flannel or underclothing of any description, a pair of gloves or an overcoat. Even in our coldest weather Mr. Hamlin, even at his advanced age, plods along, dressed in the coldest of costumes—the old-fashioned swallow-tailed coat—without wraps of any kind, while his fellows are almost frozen to death beneath big overcoats and the heaviest of underclothing. His power of endurance is wonderful, and his capacity for work great."

Tom Hughes on American Tree-Cutting.

(Spectator.)

There are few more interesting experiences than a ride through these Southern forests. The scrub is so low and thin that you can almost see away for long distances amongst pine, white-oak and chestnut trees, and every now and then a ridge where the timber is thin, or where a clump of trees has been ruthlessly "girdled," and the bare, gaunt skeletons only remain standing, you may catch glimpses of mountain ranges of different shades of blue and green, stretching far away to the horizon. You can't live many days up here without getting to love the trees even more, I think, than we do in well-kept England and this outrage of "girdling" as they call it—stripping the bark from the lower part of the trunk, so that the trees wither and die as they stand—strikes one as a kind of household cruelty, as if a man should cut off or disfigure all his wife's hair. If he wants a tree for lumber or firewood, very good. He should have it. But he should cut it down like a man, and take it clean away for some reasonable use, not leave it as a scarecrow to bear witness of his recklessness and laziness Happily not much mischief of this kind has been done yet in the neighborhood os Rugby, and a stop will now be put to the wretched practice.

There is another, too, almost as ghastly, but which, no doubt, has more to be said for it. At least half of the largest pines alongside of the sandy tracts which do duty for roads have a long, gaping wound in their sides, about a yard from the ground. This was the native way of collecting turpentine, which oozed down and accumulated at the bottom of the gash; but I rejoice to say it no longer pays, and the custom is in disuse. It must be suppressed altogether, but carefully and gently.

It seems that, if not persisted in too long, long-suffering trees will close up their wounds, and not be much the worse; so I trust that many of the scored pines, springing forty or fifty feet into the air before throwing out a branch, which I passed in sorrow and anger on my first long ride, may yet outlive those who outraged them. Having got rid of my spleen, excited by these two diabolic customs, I can return to our ride, which had otherwise nothing but delight in it.

Gems.

We shall have peace just as long as we do our duty, in small things or great.

As we supply by new flowers those which fade in our vaces, so it is the secret of worldly wisdom to re-place by fresh friendships and new associations those that fade—often, daily—from our paths through life.

Virtue in its unity demands no extraordinary powers, no remarkable talents, no superhuman efforts. It is possible to each and to all—the child may possess it as well as the wisest man, the unlearned laborer as well as the most profound scholar. The outward claims of duty vary with every varying circumstance and relation of life, but this inner claim of conscience, to be loyal to them as fast and as far as they are discovered, is one and the same to every human being.

Our childhood's home! How our affections center around the place of our nativity! How we bless that dear old name as we look over our past lives, and brush away the mist with which the River of Time, in its ceaseless flow, has obscured the purer and holier aspirations, inspired by the hopes and fears of the earlier days; how many fires are kindled on as many hearts, as we cross the old threshold of the old homestead, whose embers will glow when all others are extinguished. And, then, how our hearts go out in longings for the old scenes, when in after years we are weary with the battle of life.

They Were Solid for Garfield.

On Saturday afternoon a reporter entered Wing Lee's laundry establishment, and after transacting his business asked:

"Wing Lee, are you a republican or a democrat?"

"Me lepublican."

"Why?"

"Galafield let Chineeman come to 'Melica and washee cheap and makee monee. Democlat say Chineeman stay home and 'Melican Ilish ladee washee. Me for Galafield."

"Ah Tong, are you a republican?"

That settled it.

At Monticello, the other night, a party of young men were on a tick-tack expedition, which sport consists of attaching a string apparatus to a window-sash and then by pulling a long cord from a neighboring yard cause a pebble to swing against the window-pane. One of the boys by the name of Roth while attaching the machinery to a window of the residence of F. N. Runnell, made some noise that the inmates mistook as evidence that some one was attempting to enter the house by the window, and Runnell fired, fatally wounding Roth.

John W. Forney Outlines the March to Empire.

Garfield Fills the Gap for Grant Four Years Hence.

FOUR MILLION DEMOCRATS HOLD THE FORT OF THE FUTURE.

[Forney's Progress.]

Public opinion is the consistent changeling of time. On the 23d of June, 1880, when General Hancock was nominated as the democratic candidate for president, the whole American people felt that a great leader was chosen to rescue them from a long captivity of corruption. Garfield's nomination at Chicago, on Tuesday, June 8, as the republican candidate for the same office, had fallen upon the same people like a black cloud upon a sunny land. The name and record of Hancock were fragrant with honesty and gratitude; the name of Garfield was the synonym of indefensible corruption. The victory of the one and the consequent defeat of the other were universally asserted by the democrats and conceded by the republicans. So events rolled on till the army of placemen and the plunderers of the public treasury were roused from the despondency produced by Hancock's nomination. In a moment one wild yell of vengeance upon the formidable attempt to hurl them from power was heard all along the line. The prospect of electing Hancock to the presidency was to them like the prospect of driving the pirates from the command of a great ship by the poor captives in the hold. The robbers flew to their ready arms. They had seized the richest prize in the world; had killed most of the great commanders of the noble craft, had put in chains those who had survived, and had made of the government a terror to all good men elsewhere and how to retain supremacy they called to their aid all the agencies that money could purchase or tyranny intimidate. The resources seized by the pirates were boundless. They had reached

THE LIMITS OF HUMAN AUDACITY.

They had exhausted the patience of the people. They had filled the high places of the land with their creatures. They had enriched themselves with the priceless spoils of empire. They had enthroned vulgarity, made mediocrity royal, punished high intellect, insulted courage, trampled public opinion in the dust, converted congress into an auction administration into a Spanish inquisition, and, at the very moment when a holy sense of justice was about to hurl them into deserved ignominy, they flew to their money vaults and sounded a concerted attack upon the whole American people. It did not take long to change the auspicious outlook under such a tempest of bribery and intimidation. A great people, no matter how intelligent and patriotic, are never proof against such a crusade. Patriotism is a sentiment; but dread of poverty, fear lost patronage, the base cowardice of capital, are infirmities easily wrought into a panic, and when to these weaknesses is added the greatest of all influences, the threat of making millions of workmen beggars in a moment, what is called public opinion becomes a vast public surrender to a great public despot. The masses of the American people thus called upon to yield up their best interests before a colossal monopoly of money, patronage and fear. I write these words on the morning of the election, Tuesday, November 2, 1880, and as I look back over the more than four months since General Hancock was nominated for president, I realize that he stands forth to-day in a purer and better light than when he was the conceded choice of the whole American people. The fierce light that has been directed against him has

DISCLOSE NO SEAM OF DISHONOR

and no scars except those won in honorable battle for his country. Analysis has revealed in him higher ingredients of honor and of truth, and, as if to finish off his harmonious example, he has not been shown around the land like the chief of a circus or the manager of a menagerie. Where have the same four months left General Garfield, the republican candidate for the same high office? He began the race under a cloud of accusations against his character, private and public, made by his own party, and has not yet cleared one of them away. To-day, the American people must choose between these men, and, before this article has seen the light, one of them will be declared our leader for the next four years. Should General Hancock be our president from next March, one result is inevitable: increased prosperity throughout the land, and the disgrace of the men who predicted otherwise. All the misfortunes they anticipated will be turned into blessings, and they themselves will be pointed out not alone as false prophets, but as knowingly false; as men who to hurt a brave man, dishonored themselves, as professors of morals and practicers of deceit, as priests urging profligacy, as men of God recommending bribery, as patriots persecuting great soldiers. But should this day's work put Garfield into the presidency it will simply nationalize personal rule and perpetuate corruption. It will extend the habits and practices of the Philadelphia ring to Washington city. It will make the officeholders, already twenty years in possession, fixtures of administration for all time. It will be the decision that free government is a vast job; that and bought conscience for years past are to continue their practices at the national capital. All these steps are the direct marches to empire. The fear that the American republic is to be converted into a monarchy, under the cry of a strong government, will be realized in the compelled policy of the new president. He must be chosen in direct and deliberate distrust and defiance of the friendly offers of peace and allegiance from the south, and he can justly receive nothing from that quarter of the union but sleepless hate and relentless revenge. This hate and revenge, provoked by his own example and that of his managers, will be cordially reciprocated by millions of northern democrats. Cheated out of the presidency in 1876, and bought out of it in 1880, the people of the south and the democrats of the north will hold Garfield and all his backers not only in deadly animosity, but sternly stand aloft from them in society and in commerce. But whatever the result of this day's work, whether Hancock wins or loses, these democrats and their brave allies must remain organized. If victorious, their duties will compel vigilance and co-operation. If defeated their destiny will enforce new efforts and sacrifices. The future is theirs. The new combination is too corrupt to last. It was born of a crisis, created by a division of the majority, and all its statesmanship has only been kept alive by money. The democrats on the other hand, are accustomed to disaster as they are qualified for administration and in this hour they will be found equal to either destiny. They will command the future in or out of office.

THE ADHESIVE POWER OF PUBLIC PLUNDER

is not essential to their life, and yet it is the vital spirit of the republicans. Henceforth the democratic party will occupy the highest. To educate their voters, to spread the great truths of the old faith, to stimulate their youth, to recall and practice the lessons of the fathers—these should be the mission of that great party hereafter.

Tuesday night, November 2, 1880.—The telegraph has just finished the fate of General Hancock, and the same streets that rang with delirious cheers over his peerless valor at Gettysburg on the morning of the fourth of July, 1863, the same hearts that throbbed with gratitude over the opportune arrival which saved Philadelphia from fire and spoil, now ring and throb with delirious and ingrate joy over his defeat for president of the United States by a man denounced by his own party as venal and corrupt. What a comment on the vox populi vox Dei! As I recall my own part in this last drama with pride unspeakable, regretting only that I could not do more—I would, to-morrow, repeat the act of gratitude to a great soldier—I feel that the men who have done this thing will soon feel the chastening rod of their own conscience. An act more cruel, causeless and sameless, was never perpetrated. Men calling themselves better than others have wrought a work of hate without parallel. The over-virtuous of great communities have struck hands with the most vicious classes to spread the infection of a new sectionalism among a forgiven people, and, as they see whom they have struck and whom they have lifted up over Hancock, they turn from the contrast with shame. But let the past go. Let the dead past bury the dead.

WE NOW FACE THE EMPIRE,

and there is but one great force to meet it, the democratic party. Garfield only fills the gap for Grant. I write this name with a new feeling, that of profound regret, that one I loved so well should sink so low. First the defender of the forgiven south; then its defamer. First eager to honor Hancock for his virtues, then to hound him as an enemy. And this is the man who now wants to play the part of king hereafter. How, in the face of all these loud shouts over the defeat of Hancock, I think of the scene on the blasted heath where Macbeth meets the weird sisters:

First watch—All hail, Macbeth; hail to thee, Thane Glamis.

Second watch—All hail, Macbeth; hail to the Thane of Cawdor.

First, the general of our armies, then president, and king hereafter. How wonderful the resemblances. And mark what Macbeth said of his dream of ambition to his wife in his letter describing his interview: "They met me in the day of success, and I have learned by the perfectest report they have more in them than mortal knowledge. When I burned in desire to question them further, they made themselves air, into which they vanished. While I stood rapt in the wonder of it came missives from the king, who hailed me 'Thane of Cawdor,' by which title, before, these weird sisters saluted me, and referred me to the coming in of time, with "Hail, king thou shalt be!" This have I thought good to deliver thee, my dearest partner of greatness, that thou mightest not lose the dues of rejoicing by being ignorant of what greatness is promised thee. Lay it to thy heart, and farewell."

Why not, gentlemen? The path of empire is as plainly reached by the present triumph of money over patriotism, of as if it were lighted by a new planet. The means and the covenants are all patent to one end. An army of officeholders are organized, backed by a battery of banks—these the forces to fight, and Garfield the instrument to lead to the throne in 1884. That is the plot. It is clear. Are we ready for it? Over 4,000,000 of democrats voted for General Hancock to-day. They answer: Ready, aye ready! There should be no despondency or delay. They have a thousand interests to preserve their ranks; local duties and local candidates, and now to these they add the imperative call to active and constant work against the clearly defined conspiracies of empire. A perpetual guard of officeholders; an exhaustless treasury, public and private; a suborned press, and a great community of reluctant slaves at the polls, mean empire and nothing else.

I am only one of the millions who voted for Hancock to-day, and what I can do to aid in this great work is ready. The democratic party holds the front for the future. Its reserve is the refuge of all brave men, pledged to hostility to this new reign of capital. Its tremendous resources will prove the rescue of the public from tremendous perils. There is need, necessarily, for instant organization. In this hour, when the republicans are exulting over a purchased victory, let the democracy or the whole nation set their houses in order for the great struggle of the future.

A SOCIETY SENSATION.

Marriage of General Grant's Youngest Son.

A great flutter among society people, yesterday was occasioned by the marriage of Ulysses Simpson Grant, youngest son of General Grant, to Miss Fannie J. Chaffee, only daughter of ex-Senator Jerome B. Chaffee of Colorado. The engagement has attracted especial attention, taken in connection with Mr. Grant's California experience, and has been extensively discussed here and in San Francisco. The bridegroom is a lawyer of this city, who has already won some distinction in his profession, and whose prospects are good. Miss Chaffee is a blonde of fairest type, aged twenty-two, and has been a prominent belle in New York society. Her marriage is described by intimate friends of both as a match of pure love. The engagement has existed nearly three months; their acquaintance is of only a year's standing, and has been thus early consummated only at the earnest solicitation of the bridegroom. The ceremony was strictly private, and performed by Rev. Dr. Newman in accordance with the modified form of the Methodist Episcopal church. The Chaffee mansion, No. 28 West Fifty-Eight street, was the scene of the wedding. Among the guests were General and Mrs. Grant, Lieutenant-Colonel Fred Grant and wife, Jesse Grant and wife, ex-Senator Chaffee and a few other immediate relatives and personal friends of the contracting parties. After the ceremony an elegant repast was served in the parlor by Delmonico. The presents were profuse and costly The happy pair will probably make an extended trip to the west and south. To attend this wedding General Grant has yielded his vote in Indiana, Ill., and will not visit the west, as he previously intended. An intimate friend of all concerned said, to-day, that there had never been any engagement, or any pretence of engagement, between Mr. Grant and Miss Flood.

Can This be Death?

[Indianapolis Sentinel]

Years and years ago, before the republican party was ever born, there was, upon a certain day, a very large gathering of prominent democrats from various parts of New Hampshire. It was not a jubilee meeting, to let off superfluous enthusiasm over a sweeping victory, but quite the contrary. The democracy had just received a tremendous thrashing, and these good old New Hampshire democrats had met to talk it over. It was an assemblage of heavy hearts and sober faces, and the tone of the conference grew bluer and bluer as the talk progressed. Everybody present was ready to do a little more fighting for the democratic party himself, but did not just see as it was any use, the majority of those present seeming to fear that there was truth in the assertion of their conquerors that the democratic party was dead. With such conversation the assembled democrats had succeeded in getting themselves into a thoroughly uncomfortable state of mind, when Sturoc of Sunapee, a democrat of the old Jacksonian school, arose and proposed the conundrum which we have made the caption of this article. "Can this be death," said he, and then, when he had waited a sufficient time for them to guess or give it up, he proceeded to make a speech which electrified them. He directed their attention, not to the assertion of their enemies, that the democratic party is dead—which even then was stale with age—but called their attention to the facts proven by the election, and when he had finished, every man of them went home with a cheerful heart, convinced that the democratic party was not dead.

It occures to us that the democratic party, to-day, is very much in the condition of the democrats of New Hampshire, to whom we have alluded, before their courage had been rekindled by Sturoc. It has been badly whipped. There is not enough doubt of that to hang a single comfort on, and there are plenty of democratic croakers standing about the street corners, and with the air of first mourners at a funeral; but is the democratic party dead? Let us see. It has given its candidate for president a majority of the popular vote of the country in a total poll of nearly nine million votes.

Does this look like death? It has given this majority in the face of an unprecedentedly fierce and desperate opposition, and in spite of the expenditure of more money by the republicans to influence the election than has ever before been spent in any single campaign by all parties. Can the party which did this, and to the call of whose roster nearly five million voters responded "here," be dead? It missed of complete victory by a beggarly majority of barely twenty thousand votes in one great state, thanks to the clumsy, complicated, majority-defying piece of machinery known as the electoral college. Is this a reason why the democratic party should die? It has carried at least eighteen out of the thirty-eight states, elected nearly, if not quite, half of the members of the house of representatives, and held the senate. Shall a party with such a foothold in the country quietly walk out to a graveyard and bury itself simply because its political opponents want it out of the way? Its principles have, in no sense, been repudiated; in fact, barely discussed, but it has been beaten by the unlimited use of money and the employment of agencies like the feeling of the north against the south, which cannot be used again. Shall it, then, give up its principles and die? It has been defeated, but is that any reason why it should disband? It has made mistakes, but is that any reason why it should commit suicide? No indeed. The democratic party is no more dead now, than it was when Sturoc, of Sunapee, asked his conundrum, but will live for generations more, even as it has lived for generations since his time.

Ingersoll's Sophistry.

[Chicago Lecture.]

"A young Presbyterian, the other day, tried to convert me," he said, rubbing his hands mirthfully; "he was a new convert himself, and was very full of his own impotence. Bumble-bees, you know, are always largest when first hatched. 'You are very happy now then,' I said, 'with so many other people going to hell and you going to heaven?' Yes, he said he was happy. 'Doesn't it make you miserable,' I said, 'the knowledge of all those others going to everlasting-hell?' He said he had not thought of it in that light. 'Suppose now,' I said, 'You are saved and your mother is not—could you be happy in heaven with your mother in hell?' The young man hesitated a little, but he was faithful to his new church. 'Well,' he said, at least, 'I guess God knows what is best for mother.'"

THE SEDUCTIVE SARAH.

Now that the Bernhardt has arrived—has been interviewed by the French-speaking reporters of half a dozen metropolitan journals—professes herself delighted with everybody and everything in America—a retrospective view of her life's history will be of interest. Her life as actress, that is, for Sarah's disregard of conventionalities in private life has been so often noted that it really isn't worth while to say much about it now. The Bernhardt's mother a Jewess of Asterdam, brought her into the world at Paris, where she had disembarked from the canal boat without a sou in her pocket, on a fine May morning, after having run away from her family on account of their want of consideration for her.

The old lady was of the antique Jewish type, was fond of a nomadic life, loved jewelry, brilliant colors and possessed a violent temper, with irresistible whims. Sarah's father was a gentleman in every sense of the word—rich and high born, and he was anxious that the child should be baptized. Shortly afterwards she entered a convent at Versailles. At fifteen years of age she left it. The gossips asserted that she did this without the full consent of her parents, but the nuns gave up trying to govern her high-strung disposition. "I wish" said the child, "to be a sister, or at least an actress."

In order to accomplish this last wish she was entered at the conservatory of Paris, which was presided over by the old Auber. M. Sarcey has related the description of her reception. Sarah went before the committee of examiners, and instead of the usual violent declamations of Corneille or Racine began to recite the fable of Lafontaine, "Two pigeons loved each other with a tender love."

Auber, taking a glance at her, said "what is your name, my child?"

"Sarah, sir."

"It is a pretty name;" and turning towards the areopagus of critics; "is not the little one charming? She has repeated her fable very well;" and then turning to Sarah, "You have passed, my child."

At the end of one year's study under Samson and Provost, two famous comedians, she gained the first prize for poetry which entitles her to the great Paris theatre. But Sarah waxed impatient at the delay of her debut in "Iphigenie," had a varied experience at the Porte St. Martin, and, finally, at the Odeon. On January 14, 1867, she made her debut in the "Femme Savante." She played later in "Athalie" her first success. She was seen in addition to Anna Danby in "Kean," and in Cordelia in 'King Lear' At last she had her triumph. She created in January, 1869, the graceful part of Zanetto in "Passent," by F. Coppee. Her position was thus just assured when the war with Germany broke out. The Bernhardt, French to the core, showed patriotic devotion to her country. During the terrible siege of Paris she established a hospital in the lobby of the Odeon, and it was there that she cared for the wounded soldiers, passing at least three nights a week alongside of them. The struggle over the theatres opened as if by magic, and Bernhardt was cast for the part of the Queen of Spain in "Ruy Blas." This decided the dramatic fortune of Sarah. She showed herself to be a great artist. Her place was at the Comedie-Francaise. She was admitted there immediately, but not without some difficulty She had to pay a forfeit of 5000 francs to the Odeon. M. Sarcey says that Sarah got that amount by simply tapping the ground with her foot. Her debut at the house of Moliere was in the part of Mlle. de Belle Isle. Then followed the Juno of "Britannicus," Cherubin in the "Marriage de Figaro," Bertha in the "Sphynx." Each was a victory. In each of those varied parts Mlle. Sarah Bernhardt developed incomparable qualities. She was the butt, however, of much discussion and controversy. But after she had played Zaire and Phedre the critics gave up the fight. The public accepted her as an actress of genius. In the part of Bertha in the "Fille de Roland" in L'Etrangere, a character at once false and impossible, she was simply admirable. But it was in "Hernani" that she showed herself unequalled.

BEECHER AND BOB.

Eulogizing an Infidel.

[Indianapolis Sentinel.]

The sensation created by the speech of Henry Ward Beecher at the Academy of Music in Brooklyn, when he uttered a brilliant eulogy on Col. Robert G. Ingersoll and publicly shook hands with him, has not yet subsided. A portion of the religious world is thoroughly stirred up at what it considers a gross breach of orthodox propriety. Mr. Beecher was called upon yesterday to give his opinion of Col. Ingersoll. "I do not think there should be any misconception as to my motive for endorsing Mr. Ingersoll," he said: "I never saw him before that night when I clasped his hand in the presence of an assemblage of citizens. Yet I regard him as one of the greatest men of this age."

"Is his influence upon the world good or otherwise?"

At this question Mr. Beecher said: "I am an ordained clergyman and believe in revealed religion. I am therefore bound to regard all persons who do not believe in revealed religion as in error, but on the and progress I was bound to give him the right hand of fellowship. I would do it a thousand times over. I do not know Col. Ingersoll's religious views precisely, but I have a general knowledge of them. He has the same right to free thought and free speech that I have. I am not that kind of a coward who has to kick a man before he shakes hands with him. If I did so I would have to kick the Methodists, Roman Catholics, and all other creeds. I will not pitch into any man's religion as an excuse for not giving him my hand. I admire Ingersoll because he is not afraid to speak what he honestly thinks, and I am only sorry that he does not think as I do. I never heard so much brilliancy and pith put into a two-hours' speech as I did on that night. I wish my whole congregation had been there to hear it."

Mr. Beecher expressed regret that there were not interested in the affairs of the nation.

Col. Ingersoll was found at the Hoffman house, and said he would be happy to say what he thought of the pastor of Plymouth church. "I regard him as the greatest man in any pulpit in the world. He treated me with a generosity nothing can exceed. He rose grandly above the prejudices supposed to belong to his class and acted as only a man could act without a chain upon his brain and only kindness in his heart. I told him that night that I congratulated the world that it had a minister with an intellectual heroism broad enough, and a mental sky studded with stars of genius enough to hold all creeds in scorn that shock the heart of man. I think that Mr. Beecher has liberalized the English-speaking people of the world. I do not think he agrees with me. He holds too many things that I passionately deny, but in common we believe in the liberty of thought. My principal are two: Slavery here and hell hereafter. I do not believe that Mr. Beecher on these points can disagree with me. The real differences between us is, he says, God; I say, nature. The real agreement between us is both say, liberty. He is a great thinker, a marvelous orator, and, in my judment, greater and grander than any creed or any church. Besides all this, he treated me like a king. Manhood is his greatest forte, and I expect to live and die his friend."

He said he would indorse Mr. Beecher, no matter in what part of the globe he might meet him, as noble, whole-souled, and a splendid type of American manhood.

A Dog's Extraordinary Lunch.

[Washington Star.]

A mutilated five-dollar note was received at the treasury to-day, from Marion county, Indiana, and redeemed. Accompanying it was the following affidavit: "Before me, John E. Scott, a notary public in and for said county and state, comes Walter Rivers, who, being duly sworn, deposes and says that on or about the 2d day of September, 1880, in the city of Indianapolis, a dog owned by the deponent did feloniously and with malice intent, seize a five dollar bill, numbered B 266 480, series 1875, and bank number 40, and after chewing off the right hand lower corner and the entire left hand edge of the aforesaid bill, in spite of all due effort on the part of the deponent succeeded in swallowing the same, and no amount of after effort in choking the aforesaid dog availed to recover the torn portion of said bill; and, furthermore, deponent declares the said dog duly licensed by the city of Indianapolis under number 187, taxes paid in full to May 1, 1881, and seeks to obtain from the honorable treasurer of the United States all proper relief in the shape of a new five-dollar William." The new bill was sent.

THE EAST.

AT a public meeting in Pittsburgh it was resolved that the colored children should attend a separate school in Robinson Hall. ...At Sebastopol, near Pittston, Pa., the ground over a coal mine caved some six feet, and several houses in the district have been abandoned by the inhabitants. Several thousand dollars' worth of property has been destroyed, and mining in the vicinity has been suspended....A misplaced switch on the line of the Erie railway in New Jersey caused a collision, which killed a conductor, engineer, and fireman.

PITTSBURGH reports great activity in the iron business....The Parnell League, of New York, has adopted resolutions severely arraigning the English Government for its attitude toward and threatened prosecution of Parnell, and strongly condemning the mobilization of troops on Irish territory for the purpose of terrorizing the people and perpetuating the present system. Speaking as American citizens, the members here extend most cordial sympathy to Parnell, and promise all moral, material, and financial support....The steamer Rhode Island, of the Providence line, went ashore at Beaver point, Narragansett bay, early yesterday morning. The steamer was so badly damaged it is believed it will be a total loss. None of the passengers were lost. The steamer was valued at $500,000.

SARAH BERNHARDT upon her first appearance before an American audience, at New York, was enthusiastically received. There were about 3,000 persons in the audience. The great tragedienne was the recipient of hearty applause and many floral offerings.

THE testimony in the case of Philp, charged with forging the Garfield-Morey letter, closed at New York on the 9th, when Gen. Pryor asked the discharge of the prisoner. Judge Davis said he would render a decision on Saturday, the 13th. George Bliss then caused the arrest of S. S. Morey and Robert Lindsey for perjury, and they were committed for examination. Lindsey testified that for ten years he had not slept twice in the same place.

ROBERT GREEN, a laundryman, is the first negro to serve as a juryman in the criminal courts of New York....Col. E. L. Drake, who drilled the first oil-well at Titusville, and who thus became the founder of the petroleum interest of Pennsylvania, has just died, at New Bethlehem, Pa.

SAMUEL S. MOREY, who was arrested in New York for perjury in the Philp trial, has made a full statement of the manner in which he was induced to testify, declaring that he spent two nights before election in the rooms of the National Democratic Committee, from whom he received $150. Lindsey has confessed that he was coached by William M. Price, a Democratic elector in Maryland, and that his testimony throughout was false.

MISS MARY SIGERSON, residing in New York, repulsed offers of marriage from Andrew Gillen, a dissipated young lawyer. The latter called at her residence, threw his arm about her neck, and, in the presence of her mother, shot her dead.

SOLOMON S. MOREY and Frank Lindsey, alias O'Brien, were brought before the Grand Jury of the New York Court of Sessions on the 11th inst., and made confession that they had perjured themselves in the hearing of the Philp case. Morey was held as a State witness, and O'Brien was indicted for perjury.

A SHOCKING accident is reported from Bordell City, a small town near Bradford, Pa. One Joseph Heeps and eleven others were playing cards in a boarding-house. The fire was running low, and Heeps undertook to replenish it by pouring on kerosene oil from a peach-can. The can caught fire, and Heeps threw it from him. It fell into a can of petroleum oil, which set fire to the house. Elliot Brown, Barney Haley, and Henry Hyde perished in the flames. Joseph Barthley received fatal injuries in attempting to escape, and has since died. Mike Welsh, Henry Monroe and Willard Fresby, who were badly burned, will probably die. Heeps, the fellow who caused the disaster, escaped without serious injury....Mr. Henry Wharton, a well-known Philadelphia lawyer, and at one time associate editor of the American Law Register, is dead....Lucretia Mott died, the other day, at Philadelphia, in her 88th year. The deceased lady early identified herself with the anti-slavery cause, and championed it to the end.

THE WEST.

N. B. HARWOOD, a wholesale dry-goods merchant of Minneapolis, has suspended payment, with liabilities of $500,000. Four hundred persons are thrown out of employment....The Grand Jury at San Francisco has indicted Louis Kaplan, late Registrar of Election, for grand larceny and misdemeanor in office, and Sheriff Desmond for felony in permitting the escape of prisoners....Two freight trains ran into each other on the Marietta and Cincinnati road, near Moonville, Ohio, and Frank Lawhead, an engineer, and Charles Krick, a fireman, were killed....George Glass, of Madison, Ind., was shot dead in an affray which began by his hurrahing for Jeff Davis....Seventeen cases of small-pox developed in San Francisco in one day last week.

A FREIGHT train and a gravel train ran into each other between St. Paul and Minneapolis on the Milwaukee and St. Paul road. The collision resulted in the death of three men and the bruising and scalding of two others. The accident is said to be the result of malice on the part of Conductor McClintock, of the gravel train....Mayor Kalloch, of San Francisco, has been arrested on an indictment found against him by the Grand Jury charging him with a violation of the law in hiring men to do work on the new City Hall by the day instead of by contract, as the statutes provide....The Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad Company have purchased from the Spotted Tail and Red Cloud Indians the right-of-way through their territories a distance of 180 miles. The way will be 200 feet wide, and the company pays $110 per mile, and $4 per acre for station ground, and $5 per acre for a town site on the west side of the Missouri river.

THE town of Batesville, Ohio, has been the scene of a most horrible tragedy. It seems that Frank M. Biedenbaugh, a wealthy young German, who three years ago married the daughter of a neighboring farmer, came home late at night intoxicated, and, entering the room where his wife and child slept, assaulted them with an ax. His wife's skull was crushed by a single blow, and then his son's throat cut by the edge of the ax. He then went to a room where Mrs. Stephens, a visitor, and her child and servant-girl were sleeping, and killed Mrs. Stephens and child. The servant-girl, awakened, sprang toward the door, but was knocked senseless and left for dead. Upon recovering consciousness she gave the alarm, and the neighbors came. It was not until morning that the murderer was found hidden in a tobacco house, with his throat cut, not fatally. Jealousy, insanity and drunkenness are the theories advanced to account for the horrible crime.

J. C. AIKEN, a German farmer living near Woodford, Woodford county, Ill., his wife and his niece, were killed by a train of the Illinois Central while crossing the track in a wagon.

E. F. BERTRAND, a leading citizen of Rockford, Ill., has become grandfather to his children by marrying his mother-in-law, Mrs. Crandall....Five lives were lost by a fire in the Goodshaw hoisting-works, at Bodie, Cal.

IN the period between the 1st of May and the 31st of October there were brewed in the city of Chicago 311,047 barrels of beer. This would make about 155,523,500 glasses, or 311 glasses for each man, woman and child in the city.

THE railroad war continues. The Wabash system of roads last week reduced rates from St. Louis and Chicago to all Eastern points. The schedule adopted for limited tickets is: Boston and New York, $4.25; Philadelphia, $3.75; Washington, $3; Harrisburg and Buffalo, $3.25; Pittsburgh, $2.25. The rate between St. Louis and Chicago continued at $1 for tickets limited to twenty-four hours.

A FIVE-STORY building on Randolph street, Chicago, occupied by Dwight Bros. & Co., paper manufacturers, and Sammons, Clark & Co., furniture and picture-frame manufacturers, has been destroyed by fire. Loss, about $100,000.

THE SOUTH.

ALBERT MITCHELL, colored, has been executed at Louisa Court House, Va., for the murder of Charles B. Walton.

LOUDON county, Va., has been the scene of a tragedy of unusual horror. A farmer named Nott, becoming enraged at his wife's sister, seized a large knife used for cutting corn and assaulted her with it, stabbing the unfortunate woman until he thought she was dead. He then went into the house, and, taking his gun, returned to the spot where his sister-in-law lay. Putting the muzzle of the weapon under his chin, he fired, the whole load passing through his mouth, tearing out the tongue and lodging in his head. He fell to the ground, but while in the throes of death he saw some sign of returning life in the woman. Dragging himself to where she lay, and reaching forward, he seized a big stone and dealt her a blow in the face. As he was raising himself to repeat the blow his wife entered the yard, and taking in the situation at a glance, she herself seized another large stone, and, standing over the prostrate form of her husband, put an end to his struggles. Her sister died in a few minutes after....A passenger train on the Texas Pacific railway was wrecked near Lake Fork, Tex., and Fred Kirk, a stock agent, was killed, three men were seriously injured, and fifteen slightly. Gray, for $6,725.

WASHINGTON.

SECRETARY SHERMAN, it is said, will strongly urge upon Congress legislation of some sort to relieve the treasury vaults of the pressure of accumulating silver dollars.

SECRETARY SHERMAN'S recommendations to Congress, it is said, will probably include a law for the issue of thirty-three-year bonds, bearing 3½ to 4 per cent. interest, with which to refund $772,000,000 in 5 and 6 per cents. maturing before July. He also favors the issue of $10 certificates, stripping the greenback of its legal-tender quality, and leaving the coinage of silver dollars to the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury.

THE issue of stamps and postal-cards for October was the largest in the history of the Government, amounting to $4,312,694. The cost of the postal service to the general treasury for the fiscal year was $2,786,341.

RECEIPTS from internal revenue since the commencement of the current fiscal year up to the 12th inst. were $48,240,768, against $43,780,935 the corresponding period last year....During the fiscal year ending June 30 the receipts of the Treasury Department from customs duties amounted to $188,378,611. This sum was collected at a cost of $6,023,253.

POLITICAL.

THE increase of the Republican vote of New York city this year over 1876 is 23,165, while the increase in the Democratic vote is only 10,571, making a gain of 12,594 for the Republicans....A recent telegram from New Orleans says: "Under a contract with the Republican Campaign Committee, Capt. Sambola's company of the New Orleans Artillery, a veteran Southern organization, fired 100 guns to celebrate the election of Garfield and Arthur. Immediately after the salute a meeting of the company was held, at which Lieut. Bowler moved that Gen. Garfield be elected an honorary member, and notified of the fact. The motion was seconded by Sergt. Devere, put by Capt. Sambola, and carried by acclamation."

CONGRESSMAN FRYE, of Maine, is a candidate for Speaker of the House....Judge Key voted the Republican ticket at Chattanooga, Tenn....Mr. John C. New, Chairman of the Republican Campaign Committee of Indiana, has announced that he will be a candidate for the United States Senatorship. The other candidates who have already begun a canvass for the place are Gen. Ben Harrison, Congressman Orth, the Hon. Will Cumback, and Judge Gresham....Ex-Senator Howe, Hon. Philetus Sawyer, Horace Rublee and E. W. Keyes are candidates for the Senatorship from Wisconsin.

AT a meeting of the Tammany Hall general committee, in New York, an address to the Democracy of the country was read, claiming Hancock's defeat was due to fraud, intimidation and the use of enormous sums of money by the Republicans. Mr. Van Wyck moved an amendment that Hancock's defeat was due to the mismanagement and bickering of the Democratic leaders in Kings county and New York city. Thomas F. Grady, Col. Roberts and others opposed the amendment. Henry Steinert advocated the amendment, and said people no longer wanted Boss Kelly, and he should resign. Some hot discussion was followed by rejection of the amendment and adoption of a resolution indorsing the leadership of Kelly.

THE following are the revised footings of the Republican majorities for President and Congress in Minnesota: Garfield, 38,843; Dunnell (First district), 8,541; Strait (Second district), 5,506; Washburn (Third district), 9,635....Returns from all but three precincts in New Hampshire show a total Presidential vote of 86,177, as follows: Garfield, 44,787; Hancock, 40,757; scattering, 631.

ROBERT MCKENNA, elected by the Republicans as a member of the Tennessee Legislature, is ineligible through a conviction of incest in marrying the grand-daughter of his wife. The complexion of the United States Senate may be affected by this discovery....Secretary Sherman definitely announces himself a candidate for the Ohio Senatorship....Gov. Foster, of Ohio, says no Southerner will be appointed to a position in Garfield's Cabinet.

WITH one county estimated, Garfield's plurality in Indiana is 6,520....Returns from all the counties in New York, official and reported, give Garfield 21,536 majority....Returns from all the counties of Oregon except two show that Garfield has a majority of 547. The full returns will increase the majority to 600....The result of the California election is so close that it is now probable that some of the Garfield and some of the Hancock electors will be elected. David S. Terry, one of the Democratic electors, has been so badly cut that he is certainly beaten. Terry is the man who shot Senator Broderick, of California, in a duel, and hence runs behind his ticket.

THERE are an even dozen candidates for United States Senator in Indiana, namely: B. F. Claypool, of Connersville; Congressman Browne; President Burgess, of Butler University; John M. Butler, of Indianapolis; John M. Coburn, of the same place; Will Cumback, Judge Gresham, Gen. Ben Harrison, Editor John C. New, Congressman Orth, James M. Shackleford and Gen. A. D. Streight. Besides, there are any number of dark horses....All the returns of the election in Maine, with the exception of six small precincts, which will not materially change the result, foot up as follows: Garfield, 74,005; Hancock-Weaver electors, 64,882; Weaver straight Greenback electors, 4,076; Dow, 66; scattering, 12. Total, 147,991; majority for Garfield, 5,019....A San Francisco dispatch says that the official returns are not yet all in, but enough received to determine that the Hancock electors, except Judge Terry, have carried California by a majority of 200 to 300, while the Republicans have elected forty-one Assemblymen, giving a majority of two in the Assembly, and twelve on joint ballot.

RETURNS from all of the 102 counties in Illinois show the following result for President: Garfield and Arthur, 318,205; Hancock and English, 277,454; Weaver and Chambers, 25,821; Dow and others (about), 500; total vote, 621,980. Garfield over Hancock, 40,751; Garfield over all, 14,430....Secretary Sherman disclaims any understanding with Gen. Garfield about the future, and declares that he would not be unwilling to retire to private life for the next four years.

GEN. GARFIELD has sent his resignation as a member of Congress to Gov. Foster, of Ohio. The latter has called an election to fill the vacancy created by his acceptance of the resignation for the 30th inst.

THE private secretary of Gov. Foster, of Ohio, is authority for the statement that that gentleman does not desire, and will not accept, a position in Garfield's Cabinet.

THE official vote of the November election in Ohio has been canvassed, and shows the following result: Garfield, 375,048; Hancock, 340,871; Weaver, 5,456; Dow, 2,616; Garfield's plurality, 34,187; Garfield over all, 26,105....The official returns of the Indiana election give Garfield a plurality of 6,542. Porter, in October, received 6,952.

OMAR D. CONGER announces himself a candidate for the Michigan Senatorship, and mentions H. P. Baldwin, James F. Joy and John J. Bagley as in the field....The Atchison Champion has official returns from all the counties in Kansas except twelve on the remote frontier. The vote foots up: Garfield, 115,526; Hancock, 56,917; Weaver, 18,330; Garfield's plurality, 58,609. This will be increased to about 62,000. The total vote of the State will be about 200,000—an increase of 62,000 since 1878....Garfield's majority over Hancock in Michigan is 53,504.

FELIX PYATT, of Paris, who is under sentence of two years' imprisonment for justifying assassination, announces that his journal, the Commune, is defunct....Parnell is being burned in effigy in almost every town in England....If the English Government expected that the prosecution of the Land-League leaders would put an end to the land agitation in Ireland, they have already discovered their mistake. Far from being cowed by the threatened prosecution of their leaders, the farmers seem much more determined than ever. Meetings are being held throughout the county daily, and speeches of the most defiant character are made. A party consisting of 100 men went through the country in the neighborhood of Tralee, Ireland, and made the farmers residing there take oath that they would pay no rent greater than the Government valuation....Count Henry Von Arnim, who had the misfortune to incur the displeasure of Bismarck some years ago, and whose loyalty has been impeached, wants to be tried on a charge of high treason that he may establish his innocence of the charges preferred against him. His request has been refused.

JOHN POPE HENNESSY is making determined efforts to suppress domestic slavery in Hong Kong, China....A general uprising of the South African natives is threatened, and British reinforcements are being sent to all important points....Edwin Booth made his first appearance in London before a large, fashionable and severely critical audience in the Princess Theater as Hamlet, and was enthusiastically received. He received several calls before the curtain, and was loudly applauded....James Russell Lowell, the American Minister, delivered the evening address of the winter session of the Edinburgh Philosophical Institute. His subject was "Shakespeare."....A typhoon at Tokio demolished 1,000 houses and sent hundreds of fishermen to watery graves....The religious decrees have been executed in all portions of French territory except Algeria and Corsica....Lord Colin Campbell is soon to wed Miss Blood, a beautiful Irish girl of distinguished family....Laycock, the Australian oarsman, defeated Riley, the American, in a contest on the Thames....Rowell won the Astley belt at London, making 566 miles in six days, beating by one mile the record of Hart, the Boston colored boy. Littlewood made 470 miles, and Dobler, the American contestant, 450.

THE excitement in Ireland growing out of the Land League prosecutions is becoming intense. A Land League meeting at Athlone on Sunday, the 7th inst., was attended by 20,000 of the Irish peasantry, some of whom walked fifty miles to be present. Parnell bitterly condemned the billeting of police upon districts where semi-starvation prevails, and urged his countrymen to agitate unceasingly until they become the owners of the soil. Timothy O'Sullivan hurled among the people a copy of his indictment, and it was torn into fragments. A meeting in the County Cork was interrupted by an ex-leaguer, who, with an organized party, stormed the platform and denounced the agitation as a humbug. The dispatching of the channel fleet to the Irish coast caused indescribable excitement in Dublin.

THE expelled French monks are flocking to Spain. It is surrounded by a body of troops who expect the siege to last a month.

IN France, the Jules Ferry Ministry, after an existence of but a few weeks, has come to an end. Its fall is due to the vote of the Chambers, which, by a majority of 200 against 133, contrary to the proposal of the President of the Council, decided that the law on the reform of the Magistrature should be placed at the head of the order of the day. The Ministers thereupon tendered their resignations in a body....The Nihilist trials resulted in sentences of exile for three of the accused, and imprisonment for the other four....The siege of the Premontre Abbey at Marseilles was a brief one, as the fathers neglected to guard the door at which friends were admitted....A London dispatch says the excitement in Ireland centers in Ballinrobe, where troops are being concentrated to protect the laborers engaged in harvesting crops for an agent of Lord Erne, and where the excited peasantry are also flocking in large bodies....The early approach of winter in Russia has stopped the sowing of wheat, and numerous grain-laden vessels have been frozen up in the Volga river. ...An earthquake was felt throughout Southern Austria, on the 10th inst. At Agram, in Croatia, the shock was so violent that every house in town was injured. Several persons were killed and thirty injured. Many buildings will have to be pulled down. A large number of inhabitants fled to the fields.

M. DE BAUDRY D'ASSON, Legitimist and Ultramontane Deputy from La Vendee, who was reprimanded by M. Gambetta, President of the French Chambers, and temporarily expelled, has sent his censor a challenge to mortal combat.

A REMARKABLY disorderly and disgraceful scene was enacted in the French Chamber of Deputies the other day. It grew out of M. Baudry D'Asson's refusal to leave the Chambers when ordered by Gambetta. He had been excluded from the Chambers, but sneaked back in defiance of that body. A file of soldiers was brought in. M. D'Asson sat at his seat with folded arms, surrounded by a body-guard of Royalists and clericals. A hand-to-hand fight ensued. The Deputies resisted the troops, and refused to allow M. d'Asson's expulsion. At last Col. Riu, the commander of the soldiers, caught the bellicose Deputy round the body, a soldier took hold of his head, two more caught him by the heels, and he was carried kicking and struggling out of the house to a lock-up in the palace. The incident caused intense excitement.

THE Pope expresses sympathy for the Irish Land League, but is strongly opposed to any revolutionary proceedings.....Kelly, the notorious Australian highwayman, has been hanged.

LATER ELECTION RETURNS.

The majority for Hancock in Nevada is 600. A San Francisco dispatch of the 6th says that returns from all the counties in California except Del Norte, which is estimated the same as the last Presidential election, give Hancock 96 plurality. A few small precincts yet to hear from are not expected to alter the result much. It is quite certain that the Republicans will get one elector, as Judge Terry, on the Democratic ticket, is known to be scratched several hundred.

A New York dispatch says the latest returns from the counties in New York State make the majority for Garfield and Arthur 23,069. These figures may be slightly changed by official reports, but the result will not be affected materially.

Official vote of Delaware: Hancock, 15,183; Garfield, 14,150.

An Indianapolis dispatch says that returns from seventy-three counties in Indiana show a net Democratic gain of 307, or, to speak more properly, a falling off from Porter's vote of 307. The remaining twenty counties to be heard from will add still slightly to these figures, thus reducing Garfield's plurality a little below that of Porter.

The majority of Garfield in Iowa over Hancock will exceed 80,000, and probably go 85,000.

Official returns from forty-eight of the sixty-seven counties of Pennsylvania, and careful estimates from each of the other counties, make Garfield's plurality 37,341.

White, Republican, is elected to Congress in the Ninth (Kentucky) district over Turner, Democrat, by a majority of 1,500.

The Kansas Legislature is almost unanimously Republican.

A St. Louis dispatch says that the returns from the Sixth Congressional district of Missouri elect Hazeltine, Greenback-Republican, over Waddle, Democrat, by about 500 majority. This is the fourth Democratic loss in the State. The Greenbackers have gained two and the Republicans one.

The Electoral Vote.

The vote of the States in the Electoral College will be as follows:

SOUTHERN OPINION.

How the Election of Garfield is Viewed in the South.

"We do not for a moment imagine that the American people wish that any State should again be ruled by a Scott, a Moses, or a Bullock. The truth was that the control that was necessary, and even indispensable, in local affairs carried with it considerable influence in national affairs. With the help of two Northern States, the South could elect the President, and be master of the Government. We know, or think we know, that the power would have been exercised wisely. But the conquerors were not ready to be ruled, even to their own advantage, by the conquered. Nor would the South have been, if Grant, instead of Lee, had surrendered his army fifteen years since. Beside this latent war feeling, there was the mighty influence of the bankers, merchants and shopkeepers, who had no particular objection to the Democracy coming into place except that it involved a change of some sort, and they wished no change of any sort. Why should they? Business is good, money is cheap, every department of trade is flourishing. It is true that the currency is in an unstable condition; but a cool-headed citizen not in debt would not expect from a party which prostituted itself to the Plaistods and De La Matyrs a better dollar than would be furnished by Chittenden, Morton and Sherman, and we may add that, with eyes wide open to all its faults, the white people north of the Potomac had come to the conclusion that there was a better prospect of good government from the Republican party than from the Democracy. Whatever the exact way in which it came about, it is a hard fact that the Government of the United States for the next four years will be Republican in speech, purpose and action. The Republican President will apparently have at his back a Republican Congress. What they will they can do with the Southern States and their people. We hope and believe, however, that the business interests, which were the mainspring of Tuesday's work, will be opposed utterly to any legislation that would in any way embarrass the agriculture and manufactures, the trade and commerce of the South. It is to the interest of the North and West to take this position. They will do it whenever and as soon as the people of the Southern States cease to be posed by politicians as the would-be autocrats of the Union that they did their utmost to destroy. When this species of Southern supremacy is laid, the Northern people will be freer to exhibit their kindly feelings, and one of the first questions the Southern whites will have to ask themselves is, whether the welfare of the South has and is likely to be hindered or advanced by alliance with the Democrats of the North. It does not hurt those gentry to be beaten. They are sure to have just and equal Governments in their States in any event. Not so with the South. In losing politically the South loses in pocket and in peace of mind. Will the South remain on the losing side, and if so on what terms and for what purpose? The Southern people, we fancy, will make themselves heard on this subject before the winter is past."

The Chattanooga (Tenn.) Times editorially says:

"Hancock has been beaten by John Kelly's crowd in New York. He gave the State to Cornell, Conkling & Company last year simply because a friend of Tilden was the nominee. He kept up a constant row and turmoil in the State and city from the time Hancock was nominated until the day of the election. He nominated a municipal ticket which was a fearful load on the electoral ticket, and lost the party fully 20,000 votes. His horrible, brutal, libelous war on the proprietor of the Herald has cost another 10,000. He was charged with the conduct of the city canvass, and promised a full vote of the party. His pet for Mayor goes in by a few hundred, where a popular man could have had 60,000 majority. New York would have elected Hancock. Mr. Kelly threw it away to gratify his evil temper, and because he thought he could by no less violent means grab the city patronage. It is foolish to talk about the bloody-shirt and humbug business issues so long as we tolerate such a magazine of political nytro-glycerine in the middle of the party. Kelly must be unloaded. We cannot succeed with him. We can organize a decent and honorable defeat without him. As for the solid South and kindred issues, they have not beaten the Democrats. The North understands that the South is solid from the most natural motives. New Jersey, California, Nevada, and probably Oregon, as States, were not afraid of the solid South. Three million Northern voters cast their votes with the South. That war-cry kept the old-timers in line. Internal quarrels among the Democrats, and stupid blunderings, did more for the Republicans than they did for themselves to secure the victory."

The Augusta (Ga.) Chronicle and Constitutionalist says:

"The South at least has the satisfaction of knowing that she kept her part of the bargain, and if the "hero of Gettysburg" is not President it is not our fault. We think, too, that she has for the last time been led, lamb-like, to the slaughter. Her experiments with loyal civilians and military heroes have not been propitious in the past, and the future holds out no hopes in that direction. What she will do in the future time must disclose. Much depends upon how great a gain the Republicans have made in the Senate and House, and what their policy will be toward this section. The South will be kept reasonably solid for her own protection and for the purpose of preserving the balance of power after the next apportionment, when the political domain shifts from East to West. The tremendous problem now confronting the two parties and all sections is, Will the administration of Garfield be, in case of the control of Congress, modeled upon that of Hayes or dictated by Grant and Conkling, with Zachariah Chandler's spirit as the inspiring goblin? Until we know the exact nature of that administration we remain in abeyance. Meanwhile we may as well prepare for the worst, and hope for the best."

The Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution comments as follows:

"It is the culmination of a series of blunders, beginning with the Potter Committee and ending with the surrender of the party to the selfish whims of an element which had John Kelly for its commanding General. It would appear that the line of sectionalism has been sharply drawn by the voters of the North; but there is nothing depressing in this fact. We are willing that the North should draw a sectional line in politics, if the South be permitted to draw a line with respect to progress and improvement of those conditions and forces which make a people happy in their fields, their workshops and their homes. We have a prosperous future before us, and to this end we should look intently. We have the cause of public education to promote and the welfare of a great and growing section to foster. The South expected little more from Gen. Hancock's administration than it will ask from Gen. Garfield. We want nothing more than simple, exact, absolute justice. If the new President owes nothing to the South he at least owes something to the country, and we shall be glad to see him cancel this debt by giving us an administration as fair, just and as clean as that of Mr. Hayes."

Gen. Hancock Interviewed.

Gen Hancock was asked by a New York reporter what he thought of the result of the election.

"It would," he replied, "require too much space to print all my thoughts. Therefore, I will content myself with saying that personally I do not feel badly because I am not elected. Of course, I regret that the Democratic party, of which I am proud to be a member, has been defeated. It is a great disappointment to all of us when we fail to gain a victory in behalf of the faith and principles which we advocate. It is my wish that it be understood that I have no grief on my own account. The man who assumes the duties pertaining to the Presidency of the United States has a momentous task to perform."

"Whom do you blame for your defeat?"

"Certainly not my friends, and it was perfectly natural that my political opponents should work for their own interests."

"But, General, some of your friends have said that——"

"Oh, never mind," interrupted Gen. Hancock, "the campaign is over, and the true Christian spirit is to forgive and forget."

"It is claimed on your behalf, General, that, although you will not have sufficient votes in the Electoral College to make you President, you have received a majority of the popular vote of the country."

"That may be so. We shall know when the exact election returns are in from all the rural districts in the different States. But, be that as it may, I have the pleasure of knowing that I have hundreds of thousands of true friends, who tendered me the compliment of their votes. To merit the esteem and kind wishes of these people is the desire nearest my heart. I have always tried to faithfully serve my country in the past, and it is my earnest intention to pursue the same policy in the future, whatever may be my station in life."

About 1,500,000 barrels of flour have been shipped from Minneapolis from Jan. 1 up to November, 1880.

The great Brooklyn bridge, which is not yet finished, has already cost $12,385,178.77, and there are $87,569.48 liabilities.

A foreign milling paper says that a barrel of flour can be shipped from Milwaukee to Liverpool cheaper than from Buda-Pesth to Vienna.

While a little girl in Norwich, Ct., was combing her hair with a celluloid-band comb, near an open gas-jet, she accidentally brought her head too near the flame, and the comb took fire. The frightened girl had presence of mind enough to throw it from her head, and escaped with her hair considerably singed. The comb burned on the floor until it was entirely consumed.

Swimming is advocated in San Francisco as a cure for the opium habit. A physician gives the history of a lady who, from taking morphine to alleviate the pains of a long-protracted disease, had become a confirmed opium-eater, and was suffering all the distressing symptoms of this terrible habit. The doctor ordered her to cross the bay every day and take a swim in the Alameda baths, which she did, and in a few months was completely cured.

Jack Rafferty made a wager that he could drink without paying in every saloon on Spring street, Jeffersonville, Ind. He got safely into and out of seven places, but in the eighth, when he said "Hang it up," the bartender gave him a dreadful whipping. There were six more bars to cover, and he struggled on; but his appearance was now against him, and at the eleventh his skull was fractured with a club; so he lost the bet.

The saw-dust, which has become such a nuisance at Minneapolis and along the river below that growing city, offers a promising field of enterprise for whoever will utilize it. Several applications have already been made of it, and now arrangements are being made by a French manufacturing chemist for the establishment, at Minneapolis, of a laboratory to make from the saw-dust an acid, now imported from France, and largely used by dyers, chemists and druggists. It is to be hoped that the enterprise will be successful.

There is a manifest economic absurdity in making the Patent Office of any country a source of revenue. The fees paid to the Government should be so regulated that they will, as nearly as may be, just meet the expenses of the Patent Office. In Great Britain, as appears from a treasury return published a short time ago, the receipts of the Patent Office during the twelve years 1868 to 1879 were £1,779,892, and the expenditure only £504,322, leaving a net gain to the public exchequer of £1,275,570. Our own Patent Office management is far from free of blame in this respect also.

The Southern Pacific and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe roads are each not more than 100 miles from their point of intersection at Florida Pass, N. M., about thirty miles west of the Rio Grande, and the gap is steadily being narrowed, and will be closed about Christmas. The Southern Pacific portion of this great line will be 1,244 miles long, and the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe end will be about 1,147 miles long, making the distance from the Missouri to San Francisco about 2,390 miles. By the Union and Central Pacific roads the distance is 1,916 miles, an advantage of about 474 miles in favor of the present route for business between these points.

There are frequent references in Shakspeare and contemporary writings to "sea-coal fires," the term "sea coal" being applied to the soft coal brought by sea to London from Newcastle. Early in the thirteenth century its use was prohibited in London on account of its unhealthfulness; but the prohibition was not long observed, and it soon became the only fuel. Combined with the thick and constant fogs which hang over or enwrap the city, the smoke and soot is increasing the death-rate every year, and has even caused some fear of a catastrophe which shall end in suffocating the whole city, and the calamity of Pompeii in a different form be repeated. One of the remedies proposed is the importation of anthracite from this country, so that the term of "sea coal" may come into use again.

The gold reserve in the Bank of France amounts to $140,800,000, in the Bank of England to $128,312,650, in the United States treasury to $135,244,839, and in the Bank of Germany to only $47,000,000, the remainder of the latter's reserve—$85,000,000—being in silver. The gold in France and England is steadily decreasing, much of it coming to this country. In France, under the operations of the double standard, gold is drained from the bank in exchange for silver, but the finances of that country are in a most healthy condition. In the first ten weeks of the business season last year—from Aug. 1 to Oct 9—the gold imports at New York amounted $40,300,203, and in the same time $29,899,548 in gold and $69,775,086 in legal tenders were drawn from the New York banks and United States treasury to supply the demands of business. In the same period this year the specie imports have amounted to $82,332,205, while $49,481,118 in gold and $9,854,570 in legal tenders have gone out and into various channels of business.

The miles of railroad operating in these ten States aggregate about 40,380; the cost of constructing and equipping was about $1,900,000,000; the annual gross earnings about $218,000,000; and the net earnings nearly $93,000,000. The net earnings of the railroads of Illinois alone exceeded, in 1879, $30,000,000, and the 6,380 miles in Ohio report a net earning of nearly $20,000,000. The enterprise and energy of our capitalists, and their faith in the future of this country, have been exhibited to a greater degree in this matter of railroad building than in any other of the enterprises which have placed the United States foremost among the nations of the world.

A writer in the New Orleans Picayune says the fashion of going without gloves, which has prevailed among young men for some time, owes its origin to an accident. The Prince of Wales had been dining and wining rather late with several other "jolly good fellows," and subsequently attended a reception a little the worse for liquor. He had forgotten his gloves, but was in no condition to stand upon trifles. His little irregularity instantly revolutionized the fashion, for, as his ancestor remarked, "nice customs curtesy to great Kings." Immediately all the swells went to receptions with their hands bare. "Unhappily," says the writer in the Picayune, "the fashion spread to this country, and at opera, theater, ball and reception our jeunesse doree wore no gloves. It looked badly enough anywhere, but when it came to gentlemen dancing with elegantly attired ladies, and encircling a delicate silk or immaculate satin waist with an arm whose ungloved hand, aided by the dust and other causes, left an indelible imprint upon the back of the dress, it became high time for the ladies to protest at thus being 'handled without gloves.' So some bright young man, fertile in expedients, in a flash of inspiration, pulled out his silk handkerchief, and gracefully inserting it between the dress and the bare hand, prevented a social revolution and introduced 'la mode.'"

No Wonder He Failed.

He don't live in Galveston now, but he used to. He went into the interior and applied to the School Board to teach school. They examined him, and were surprised to learn that Cuba was a South American republican republic. He also startled them somewhat in geography and history, and, as for arithmetic, he bankrupted the whole numeral system. His proposition to teach was laid on the table. He subsequently, however, made a motion for a new trial, which was granted. After the second examination a friend met him, and said:

"I hear you failed on the second trial?"

"No wonder I failed. They asked me the very same questions they did before."—Galveston News.

Japanese Paper.

The English paper-makers begin to fear that they will be ruined by Japanese cheap labor. The skill of the Japs in in the paper business is well known. The Imperial Japanese Government has paper mills at Tokio, and an agency has been established right in the heart of London, where the royal paper-makers threaten to undersell the home manufacturers. Deeply as we would regret to interfere with the accumulation of wealth by our worthy paper-makers here, we still hope that when this item meets the eye of the High Mikado Kockelorum in Japan, he will at once establish a paper-selling agency in this country. The Imperial paper-maker can hear of something to his advantage by calling up at this office the first time he is in Detroit.—Detroit Free Press.

A handsome boy of 14 was seen lying by the roadside, at Carrollton, La., early in the evening, by many persons on their way to a political meeting. He was moaning, and would not reply to their questions. They concluded that he was drunk, and let him alone. The fact was that he had shot himself because of a failure to get work or food. He belonged to a wealthy New Orleans family, but had run away from home. The first attempt at suicide was not successful, but when the people returned from the meeting they found him dead, a second shot having completed the work.

WHAT HAS THE COUNTRY GAINED?

[From the New York World.]

The country will have time enough, and we fear reason enough, to reflect on the causes of the defeat of Gen. Hancock. It is sufficient to-day to point out some of the more obvious and general of these causes.

The tariff issue which the Republican orators and journalists, without knowing or caring what it meant, imagined would be useful to them as a means of frightening business men, equally ignorant, to a great extent superseded the sectional issue in the manufacturing districts of the Eastern States. But, taking the country through, it is evident that "the solid South" was still the bugbear upon which the Republicans most successfully relied. Their appeal was to sectional hate and fear—to hatred of a section which had been fairly beaten in battle, and to fear of a section which Senator Conkling, the most conspicuous advocate of the Republican cause, devoted his speeches to showing is too weak to be in any way formidible. That Americans should have been moved to vote for a candidate like Garfield by appeals of this kind does not speak well either for their magnanimity or for their intelligence.

The cry of "the solid South" is the more curious since, practically, the sectional "issue" is not an issue at all in a political sense. A political issue is raised when one party proposes a policy or a system of laws which the other party opposes, or when one party proposes the repeal of legislation by which the other party stands. What issue of that kind was raised by the Republican campaign orators? The laws providing for the Federal control of elections will undoubtedly be repealed by the Democrats if the Democrats ever have power to repeal them, but these laws are not sectional. They are simply devices to enable the party in control of the administration to swindle the opposition in communities in which the opposition has a majority of voters. This is perfectly well understood, and, except publicly, is not denied. These laws are simply part of the party machine and have nothing to do with the purposes which parties are organized to promote. They will be used against the East or the West, just as they have been used against the South, whenever the occasion arises. One would have imagined, to hear the Republican speakers talk, that they seriously proposed to do something about the South, but they do not. The logical consequence of their position is that the reconstruction laws should be revived, and the South remanded to a condition of tutelage and of government by Major Generals, such as it was subjected to in 1867. But in point of fact no measure looking to that end has been advocated or so much as introduced by any Republican in Congress or elsewhere. The collapse of the reconstruction laws in 1877 was final and complete. Mr. Hayes withdrew the troops from the South with the acquiescence of the whole of his own party, the leaders of which were alienated, not by that action, as to which he plainly had no alternative, but by the spasmodic and somewhat ridiculous attacks he made upon their own power. Gen. Grant would equally have been compelled to withdraw the troops. The failure of Republican reconstruction was confessed in 1877. If Grant means through Garfield to try the experiment again in 1881 he has kept his intention a secret, and his secret has been as well guarded as the conspiracy of the South and the Democrats of the North to pay the "rebel claims." If it was really proposed to revive the reconstruction acts the proposition would of course be infamous—as infamous as Mr. Conkling's plea that the North ought to side with the Republican party by reason of the poverty to which the Republican party had reduced the South. Nobody disputes that the South has been more prosperous, more orderly and more valuable to the Union since the failure of the Republican reconstruction was confessed and the attempt at reconstruction abandoned than it was when every Southern white man was compelled to be a politician in order to protect himself from being plundered by the negroes and carpet-baggers whom the Republican party had set over him, and when negroes and carpet-baggers represented the Southern States in Washington.

The attempt to disturb this order and to check this prosperity by a revival of the reconstruction laws would be an outrage which the whole country would resent. But was it any the less outrageous, was it not rather more outrageous, to make a sectional campaign without an object? Yet no Republican orator and no Republican journal between June and November proposed a single object to be attained as the result of an agitation in itself mischievous. Ask the first Republican you meet why he voted for Garfield, and the chances are nine in ten that he will tell you he meant to rebuke the spirit of the South. He will admit, if he is an intelligent and honest man, that the candidate of his party is tainted and that it went against his grain to vote for him. But if you ask him what Gen. Garfield can do to rebuke the assumed spirit of the solid South, such a Republican will own that Garfield can do nothing. It is not even the acts of the Southern people to which the stalwarts have objected, for the freshest "political murder" charged by the stalwarts upon the South is at least three years old—but to the supposed "sentiment" of the South. "Woe be to us," as Gen. Hancock wrote to Pease, "whenever it shall come to pass that the power of the magistrate, civil or military, is permitted to deal with the mere opinions or feelings of the people." Now that Gen. Garfield is elected he cannot interfere to undo again what Hayes has done with the virtual consent of all parties. There is in fact no way in which the General Government can now do anything whatever toward the practical settlement, or rather the practical unsettlement, of the Southern question, and the sectional agitation has, therefore, been carried on for its own sake and for the sake of the Republican placemen who have succeeded in keeping their places by means of it. For their sake the country has been invited to divide against itself and to blow into fresh flame the embers of the war, which would long ago have died out if left alone. For their sake the shame of seating in the chair at Washington a politician whom the leaders of his own party despise has been incurred by the greatest republic in the world.

THE TEMPORARY TRIUMPH OF EMPIRE.

[From the Cincinnati Enquirer.]

It appears that Grant, Conkling, Cameron, Logan have been elected President. It appears as we write that the effect of the October election was too potent to be overcome. This October effect has never failed to make itself felt in our Presidential election. While Pennsylvania was an October the other States followed Pennsylvania like sheep jumping down a precipice. The methods by which Ohio and Indiana were carried in October are known to the country. It was these methods, therefore, that won the election yesterday, for we assume that it is lost to the Democracy. What has triumphed? Sectionalism has triumphed; Chinese cheap labor has triumphed; the coercion of the white workingman has triumphed; falsehood in newspapers and on the stump has triumphed; centralization has triumphed; the empire has triumphed. It is not the triumph of Garfield, it is the victory of the strong man who came to his rescue in Ohio and Indiana before the 12th of October, and in whose hands he is. We cheerfully announce to the people of the United States, or the large portion of them who will read this issue of our journal, that we can endure these victories if they can endure them. We are certainly in as good a position to suffer them as the laboring men of the United States. We shall continue business at the old stand, notwithstanding the transient triumph of a cause which ought not to be the victor.

Who and what have been beaten? A brave Union soldier, heroic in battle. A noble and splendid lover of civil liberty in peace has been defeated. The beautiful sentiment of reunion, the harmonious impulses that should fill the hearts of the people of one country have been for the moment crushed. It is disclosed by the methods we have indicated that Union is not wanted. It is announced that the great rivers that flow like arteries through this continent to the gulf, bearing upon their bosoms the rich argosies of an industrious people, begin in one country and end in another. That was the commanding argument of the canvass, and that is the interpretation to be placed upon the verdict. This, therefore, is not the triumph in which the patriotic American finds cause for exultation. There is in victory no flavor of fraternity, no gentle belief that this country is to be one in the affections of the future, as it is one in history, in interest, in geography, in beauty. The Republican party in conducting this campaign and this election have done all that they could do to destroy this sentiment of Union.

* * * *

But the triumph of yesterday is not permanent. The Democratic principle, the idea which underlies our system of government, is as lasting as the continent on which that Government dwells. The Democratic party, old as the country, can survive the defeats of a quarter of the century. It has "Sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat"—while the republic lives it will live. If the country seem now at the feet of a spirit of centralization, of centralized power that does not differ from the empire, it is in spite of Democratic protest; and the Democratic party, notwithstanding this temporary reverse, will falter not from its lofty spirit; will fail not in its final purpose; will continue its splendid march in the cause of the people against power in the cause of Democracy. There is a story of a people who were forty years in the wilderness. They were engaged in no better cause that that of Democracy on earth. The Democratic party is one of invincible hope; and it has belief in the doctrine:

Right forever on the scaffold,
Wrong forever on the throne,
But that scaffold sways the future,
And behind the dim unknown
Standeth God within the shadow,
Keeping watch above His own.

Cremation of the Dead.

Exactly how to dispose of the ashes of the dead in the most satisfactory manner, after cremation is accomplished, is still a question. The ancient practice was to deposit the ashes in a funeral urn, to be preserved in a tomb or other sacred place. This is also the modern custom. But if tombs are to be required then there is not much need for cremation, as the corpse may as well be buried in the tomb without cremation.

A recent American patent consists in providing a parlor bust of the deceased, cut in marble, and in making a hole in the back of the bust, wherein the ashes are to be deposited after cremation of the body.

A further improvement, suggested by one of our lady correspondents, is to prepare a wet mixture of cements for artificial stone or marble, and sprinkle the ashes of the deceased into the mixture, which is then to be cast or pressed into the form of busts, statuettes, or other objects. In this way various members of a family might possess enduring portions of the ashes of the departed one.—Scientific American.

Mrs. Hicks-Lord has had a successful career in London. She rented a pretty house, which she fitted up with the taste and skill for which she has always been distinguished. So crowded, indeed, were her rooms with pictures, statuary, curiosities and old china that they were said to rival even those of Lady Bardett-Coutts. She has gathered about her a circle of decayed society magnates, including Dukes, Earls and Marquises, with a plentiful sprinkling of church dignitaries.

Mendicancy is forbidden in Paris and the neighboring villages. But under various pretences it seems to be more prevalent than it has been known for a long time. Some of the persons who beg in Paris have known better days, and are dainty in their language. A gentleman said to an outstretched palm: "I have not a sou about me." "Sir," exclaimed the worthy medicant with a sneer, "I have not specified the species of coin."

The new engines of the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago railroad have begun to arrive. There are seven of them, all large and first-class machines.

The new Supervisor of the Census in Fort Wayne apprehends that the reenumeration will not go ahead of 27,000, being only a gain of only a few hundred.

Capt. Storey, who traveled many years as a clown in Van Amburg's, Dan Rice's, the Great Eastern, and Sells Brothers' circuses, died at Sullivan recently.

Indiana has made an extensive addition to its State Museum by securing the geological collection made by John McCormack, the hermit of Madison, and by him bequeathed to personal friends.

A bull butted an Ohio and Mississippi freight engine and several cars from the track, at Starksville, the other evening, delaying passenger trains several hours.

At the residence of Jacob Leatherman, near Delphos, a young girl 8 years old named Ella Latinde fell into an open fire-place, while the elder people were attending a corn-husking, and was burned to death.

A boy was shot in the neck and badly wounded while attempting to play a joke on F. N. Bunnell, of Monticello. The lad was fastening a string to the window of Bunnell's residence, and was mistaken for a burglar.

Frank Ridgeway, a young man of Wabash, who went out squirrel hunting, was found dead and his faithful dog keeping watch over the body. The gun had evidently been discharged as Ridgeway was climbing a fence.

In digging a ditch on the farm of John H. Caylor, four miles southeast of Noblesville, on the Greenfield pike, the laborers struck a part of the remains of what local naturalists pronounce to have been an American elephant.

A brass cannon, one of the trophies captured in the Mexican war, was borrowed of the Senator, John Benz, of Crawford county, to fire over the State election. Gov. Porter, it is said, will make a requisition for this valuable trophy when he takes his seat.

Dr. James W. Brackett, of Rochester, surgeon in an Illinois regiment during the late war, was badly ruptured during his service. Nine years ago he applied for a pension. For years he heard nothing concerning it, but last week received a letter from Washington containing a draft for $5,100, besides which he is to receive $25 per month during his life. The doctor is over 60 years of age.

The Indiana State Christian Conference met last week at Hagerstown to listen to the annual address, which was delivered in a masterly manner by Rev. Peter Wynebrenner. The election of officers for the ensuing year followed, resulting as follows: President, John G. Phillips, of Sullivan county, re-elected; Vice President, Peter Wynebrenner; Secretary, D. W. Jones, of Fort Wayne; Treasurer, D. S. Davenport; Trustees, to fill vacancies by limitation, W. Ludlow, John Mass.

Spencer county has been the last to respond to questions of inquiry sent out by the State Bureau of Statistics. Last year but 627 townships out of 1,100 paid any attention to their statistics, but this year there are only three delinquents. The questions propounded refer chiefly to agriculture, and are thorough and extensive. It is intended to do as much forecasting as can be done with any degree of accuracy, so that the report will contain much vital information, where it was formerly devoted to reference matter. The prospects for a good report for 1880 are good.

There is a romance connected with the case of Andrew J. Miller, a life convict at Jeffersonville, just pardoned. Shortly after he came to the prison, in 1873, a man named Trader was discharged by expiration of sentence. He went to Terre Haute, became acquainted with Miller's wife, and, after a divorce was obtained, married her. Not long after the marriage Trader killed a man, and was sentenced to Jeffersonville again on a life sentence. Strange to say, both men accuse this woman as being the exciting cause of the murders they committed.

The delinquent tax collectors have made a levy on the library of Wabash College, in default of $8,972.55 back taxes claimed off the college. This amount was discovered to be due Montgomery county, reported to the County Commissioners, who ordered it placed against the college on the duplicate, which was done. The college authorities claim that they owe no tax, and that, being an educational institution, the college is not liable for taxes. The levy was made for the purpose of bringing the matter before the courts as a test case. The library will not be disturbed, and will continue to be used by the college as though no levy were made.

THE cities of Fort Wayne and St. Louis were the only places where a re-enumeration of the census was accorded. In the former an increase of some 900 is noted, but St. Louis has completed her count and finds she has 238,862, a loss of nearly 100,000.—Fort Wayne Sentinel.

THE Boston Herald (independent republican) in an article of warning against a radical or stalwart policy, concludes as follows:

Laws calculated to keep the republican party in power must meet the wants of the nation. No others will keep any party in power, as democrats have just learned and as republicans must learn, unless they use their new lease of power wisely. The people are mightier than party.

* * *

THE Virginia and Tennessee democrats have defeated the debt-repudiators in their respective states. The people of these states have been vilely abused by the republican organs as "repudiators." They have shown that the charge is false. Let Minnesota and Massachusetts, the two repudiating states (republican, too,) of the north, follow the example of Tennessee and Virginia.

SENATOR MORRILL, of Maine, in speaking of the thieving tariff, says: "We have arrived at a period when less taxation is required for the support of the government. We also have arrived at a season of prosperity. It is reasonable and proper that our taxation, external and internal, should be revised and adjusted to the change of circumstances." The democratic congress should grapple this question at the next session and give the country the needed relief.

WHAT a revival we shall have, if the thousands of christain men who have gone zealously into this political campaign will give the same time, sympathy, zeal, to labor for the salvation of souls!—Methodist.

Yes, verily, brethren. If you will work for Christ with half the energy and zeal with which many of you have labored for Garfield during the past two or three months, there will be a rattling of the dry bones of theology and a revivification of the present dead-and-alive church that will astonish you. —Goshen Democrat.

THE census bulletin, No. 8, shows that South Carolina has a population of 995,906, of which 391,071 are whites and 604,835, colored. This is a very good-sized colored population, considering that the republican leaders and organs have so frequently stated that for fifteen years there has been a "daily massacre of negroes" in the state. At the rate of depletion indicated by the republican organs, there must have been 547,500 negroes "slaughtered" since 1865 in South Carolina. Even Mr. Redfield, who has been making murder a study for some time, will probably hesitate to certify to those figures.

* * *

WHY was not Gen. Garfield called to the stand, if he was so cruelly libeled, and forced to give his testimony under oath? Because he dare not. There are too many examples in the Garfield family of being imprisoned in jail for high crimes. The Auburn prison is one example. Lewis Garfield, own cousin of the president-elect, is there incarcerated for a period of twelve years for burglary.—Fort Wayne Sentinel.

Lewis Garfield, first cousin of DeGolyer Garfield, was one of a party of three who burglarized the house of Sol. Barney, at Spencerville, this county, on the night of December 1, 1879. He was afterwards captured in Canada, and came to trial at this place, before Judge Lowry, Monday, May 24, and May 27 a verdict was rendered, finding Lewis Garfield guilty, and placing his sentence at ten years in state's prison. He is now serving that sentence in Michigan prison.

General Grant.

The republican press every now and then manifests a great deal of solicitude about General Grant's welfare, and insists that the American people owe it to themselves to sustain him in a style of splendor, in keeping with the "first citizen of the republic." Grant is not a beggar, and if he had the pride of character that a man in his station should have, he would protest against being advertised in this style. The Indianapolis Sentinel contains the following well-timed remarks upon the subject:

The New York Times is very anxious to find ways and means to support General Grant in luxury and ease. The Times wants to raise a fund of $250,000, which it thinks can be invested so as to raise $12,500 annually, upon which General Grant could probably maintain a fair amount of style. The Times in a double leaded editorial, starts out and starts in upon the subject as follows:

For a man who has occupied the position of the first citizen of this republic, a return to the comparatively humble position from which he emerged is, therefore, impossible. In proportion to the value of his services and the luster of his career will it be difficult for the people to regard an ex-president of the United States as entirely divested of the authority which he once exercised or as entirely devoid of a certain representative character which it touches the good name of the nation that he should adequately sustain.

All of which is confounded tomfoolery. We do not care to discuss the question of "first citizen." If General Grant was ever "first citizen," he was wonderfully well paid for it. He never played "first citizen" for nothing. As "first citizen" he was on intimate terms with some of the greatest rascals of modern times, and since he ceased to be "first citizen" he has strolled through the country making stump speeches, like any other republican blatherskite, and has used his opportunities to throw mud at a brother soldier, because the democratic party honored him with the nomination for president. Such behavior on the part of General Grant effectually deprived him of all claim to "first citizen," and shows him to be capable of occupying an "humble position," but a questionable position. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat, in commenting upon the article of the Times, says:

The proposition, which seems to be made in all seriousness, proves that the editor of the New York Times is entitled to the blue ribbon as the banner ass of American journalism. Even if the people of the United States were disposed to go into the pension business, they would certainly not do it in a way to magnify the importance of an otherwise obscure editor and to make the dignity of the presidential office serve as a puff to the enterprise of a newspaper, which is really the object and motive of the superserviceable editor. Fortunately, it is not necessary to rebuke the impertinence of such a proposition, as the people to whom it is made, have their own way of rebuking it by merely refusing to recognize it, and thus denying it the notoriety it covets.

The country has heard about enough of Grant's poverty. He has been offered a good many lucrative positions, and has declined them all. A late estimate places Grant's wealth at $500,000. If he has not that much property of various descriptions, let him say so. It he has any claim to "first citizen" he will peremptorily order the Times to stop advertising him as a strolling, houseless and homeless mendicant. It is a national disgrace. R. B Hayes will soon be released from the honors and pay of Tilden's office, and he, too, may want a pension, and this thing of pensioning republican presidents will become as great a scandal as the Louisiana frauds, the credit-mobilier infamy, or the disgusting spectacle of Grant following in the wake of Conkling, to malign General Hancock.

The death of Mrs. Elizabeth Appleton Dills, wife of Dr. T. J. Dills, occurred in Fort Wayne last Saturday; Of this estimable lady, the Fort Wayne Sentinel of November 13, says: "The sad event, by which a fond husband loses a most estimable wife, and a helpless babe is rendered motherless, occurred, after an illness of about three weeks duration.

Mrs. Dills was born at Carrolton, Kentucky, in the year 1850. When death claimed her, therefore, she was in the thirtieth year of her age.

She was married to the gentleman who now mourns her loss, in the city above named, not much over a year ago. Mrs. Dills was a member in good standing, of the Episcopal church, having identified herself with that body some fifteen years ago, in Trenton, New Jersey.

Mrs. Dills passed quietly away, this morning, surrounded by her father, mother and husband, and a number of most intimate friends, with a sure hope of awakening in that heavenly abode, where death is unknown.

The premature removal of the deceased lady, is a sad blow, not only to her immediate relatives, but to Fort Wayne society at large. A more admirable lady never existed, and her death will cause genuine and widespread sorrow throughout the community."

The doctor has many friends in this section who deeply sympathize with him in his great affliction.

THE Minnesota asylum for the insane, at St. Peter, was destroyed by fire on Tuesday the 16th. A telegram from St. Peter says that the number of lives lost by burning and freezing in the insane asylum are variously estimated at from twenty to fifty. The loss on the building is $300,000. A special says that the scenes at the burning of the south wing of the hospital were heart-rendering in the extreme. So appalling a sight has rarely been witnessed, and may never be again. Patients in the annexed wing were males. They refused to leave the building at all. They ran up and down the halls screaming and crying, and acting like bedlamites. There were, of course, those who could not be coaxed or forced out of the building, and became the unhappy victims of the flames, and suffocated in the pit of the flames. Others were saved, some by ladders and some by leaping from the windows; some were nearly nude, some shoeless and hatless, and all were exposed to the exceeding cold of the night. Many of the poor demented and crazed inmates fled as if for their lives, and could not be overtaken or confined. Their sufferings in this frightful condition can be better imagined than described. The whole catastrophe is fearful to contemplate, and impossible to describe. The poor, dazed inmates of the asylum who had escaped the flames were at large, half clothed, and were to be seen in all directions flying in wild fright from those who attempted to save them. The air was bitter cold, and the poor wretches, with half-naked bodies and bleeding feet, were flying about, hiding in alleys and dark corners. It was a sight, once seen, never to be forgotten. For some time the capacity of the building has been tried to its utmost. There were about 600 patient, and every inch of space was utilized. What will be done with these poor creatures, turned out in the cold and their malady increased by the excitement of the occasion, is a serious question. There are two other buildings situated in town, which are used, but they are crowded to their full capacity. The asylum at Rochester is full, and will doubtless be unable to provide accommodations for any of the inmates at St. Peter.

GENERAL SHERMAN, in his annual report, recommends increasing the army to 30,000. He says: "I agree with General Sheridan that the army is too small to fulfill the heavy duties now imposed on it, and is overworked. I therefore renew my recommendation of last year that congress be asked to give 25,000 enlisted men specially to troops of the line of the army, and to make separate provision for detachments of advance men, engineer battalion, hospital stewards, detailed clerks, etc., in the same manner as has already been done for the signal corps.

In this connection I will venture to call your attention to the fact that the revised statutes, the edition of 1878, section 1,115, defining the organization of the army, limits the strength to 'not more than 30,000 enlisted men;' but subsequent appropriation bills, by provisos, have limited the expenditures to 25,000 enlisted men. Still, the legal strength is 30,000 enlisted men, and that number is the least possible number at which we can maintain the present organization of forty regiments in anything like good order, discipline and economy, and I infer this end can be reached by simply omitting the provisions in the next appropriation bill."

Carr's Corners.

—John Shugars and A. A. Penland made a flying trip to Fort Wayne Tuesday.

—Mr. Joseph Truat has completed his new kitchen, and is now living in the same.

—School No. 3, taught by Henry Shull, is in a prosperous condition, Hank is a jolly fellow and proves to be the right man in the right place.

—Sheets and Thomas are hauling a large number of logs to their saw-mill near this place. The logs will be made into lumber for shipment during the coming winter.

—Mr. and Mrs. John Coy and Mr. Christian Sheets availed themselves of the reduced rates, over the B. & O., and started last Wednesday for Kansas, where they will visit relatives.

—Another wreck on the B. & O. last Saturday. A hand-car jumped the track somewhere between Auburn junction and St. Joe, scattering the hands in every direction. No lives were lost.

—A pleasant party of youngsters gathered at the residence of Mr. Swisher, last week, to celebrate the sixth birthday of Miss Laura. She was made the recipient of a large number of presents by the assembled guests, for which she returns thanks. C. O. D.

Thanksgiving.

His Fraudulency, R. B. Hayes, feels grateful, and has issued a proclamation recommending that this people return thanks to God, and not to the republican party, for our happiness and greatness as a nation. The following is his proclamation:

"At no period in their history since the United States became a nation, has this people had so abundant and so universal reasons for joy and gratitude at the favor of Almighty God, or been subject to so profound an obligation to give thanks for his loving kindness and humbly to implore his continued care and protection. Health, wealth and prosperity throughout all our borders, peace, honor and friendship with all the world; firm and faithful adherence by the great body of our population to the principles of liberty and justice which have made our greatness as a nation, and the wise institutions and strong frame of the government and society which will perpetuate it. For all these let the thanks of a happy and united people as with one voice ascend in devoted homage to the Giver of all good. I therefore recommend that on Thursday, the 25th day of November next, the people meet in their respective places of worship to make acknowledgment to Almighty God for his bounties and his protection, and to offer him prayer for continuance.

In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States to be affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 1st day of November, in the year of our Lord, 1880, and of the independence of the United States the one hundred and fifth. (Signed) R. B. HAYES.

Local and Miscellaneous

—A few more weeks will bring the close of the 10th volume of the COURIER. Ten years ago this paper started out upon the battle ground with the democrats of old DeKalb to trample under foot the party that was, and is yet, so corrupt. It has endeavored to do its duty, and has been faithful to its party; has done all in it power to put down corruption, bribery and fraud—but it has failed. The republican party at each election has thrown open wide its money vaults and with stuffed ballot-boxes won the race. But, thank God, the time is near at hand when honesty and free government will prevail. Only one state was between us and the enemy at the last election, and it was no doubt gained by money influences on behalf of the republicans and mismanagement on the part of democratic leaders. But we will drop this subject for the present, and remind our readers of some things which the COURIER has done: It has enhanced the interests of the county, aided our citizens by encouraging manufacturing institutions, railroads, etc. It has taken particular pains to encourage all enterprises, it has extended a welcome hand to all newcomers, has been a friend to the merchant, the manufacturer and the tradesman; has been a welcome visitor to many a fireside. The COURIER rests upon a sure foundation, and enjoys a large subscription list; its advertising patronage is fair and job department is in a flourishing condition.

—On coming out of a store on Main street last Tuesday, we observed a crowd of excited men listening to an individual who was gesticulating widely. Supposing that something unusual had happened, we steered across the street to ascertain what was the matter. Sure enough, the speaker was telling of deeds of gore, and now we felt sure of matter for a first-class sensation. "Yes," said the speaker, "it was a bloody affair between father and son. From words they came to blows; the young man struck his father with an axe, felling him to the ground.

"Where—when did this happen," we asked.

"In the fall of '62, I think it was."

"Oh——," but it is not important what we said.

—The holiday season is near at hand, and the merchants should be wide-awake to their calling. The people, both in the city and country, look over each issue of the COURIER in search for your advertisement, and more especially at this season of the year. The merchants who advertise their holiday goods the most extensively, are the ones who invariably have the trade. Parents, and especially those living out of town, are waiting patiently for you to invite them through the columns of your county paper to come and inspect the holiday goods you have in trade. So, then, be "up and doing," and not have it said that your neighbor, through his enterprise, sold more goods than you did.

—John Ashley, like all democrats, filled his contract with Frank Leas last Saturday evening by wheeling him from the Wabash depot to the postoffice. They started at four o'clock in the afternoon, and at seven the same evening had reached about two-thirds of the distance agreed upon. There was no particular time set to arrive at their destination, and John took advantage of this particular point. At each business house that he came to, he would go in and have a chat with "the boys". The lateness of the evening compelled a postponement of the affair. Several little boys followed up in the rear and the whole performance was interesting.

—The National Live Stock Journal, speaking of the Chicago fat stock show, commencing November 15, says: "Let every man who wants to educate himself on the cattle question, on matters of feeding, breeding and management, on what constitutes true merit in beef breeds—on the difference between breeds when matured, on the relative advantages of early and late maturity—in short, everybody interested come to this great school of the feeder's and breeder's art. It has no equal on the continent, and no farmer is so wise but he may here learn something that will be worth money to him in his business."

* * *

—It is an easy matter, while riding through the country at this season of the year, to distinguish the prosperous farmer from the unsuccessful one. The former has his farm implements, the plow, the drag, the harrow, etc., under cover, and when the springtime comes again they appear bright and are ready for use. The latter will have his plow where he used it last, the drag thrown carelessly by the side of the barn, the harrow in yonder fence corner, and so on. His fences are down and rotten, the buildings are old and dilapidated.

—This is the time of year that the town cow has a "soft snap." She gets her daily rations from the rear end of the country wagon. The farmer's bull pup is tied just too short to reach her. The farmer picks up a brick-bat and takes deliberate aim at the cow, and twice out of three times hits his favorite pup square between the eyes.

Going to Leave.

We announce regretfully that Rev H. Johnson will leave us soon. He goes to take charge of the First Presbyterian church of Grand Haven, Michigan, to succeed Rev. John R. Sullivan, D. D. By his genial spirit and pleasing manner during several years residence here, Mr. Johnson has drawn around him a large circle of warm friends who will sincerely regret his departure. The call to such a responsible charge as pastor of one of the largest churches in the state of Michigan, is a well deserved tribute to this christian gentleman. He has been the most efficient clergyman the Presbyterian church has ever had in this place. The interests of the church have flourished under his watchful care. He has attended strictly to his profession, and has rendered good account of his stewardship. He will leave behind him an admiration among honorable men that cannot be swept away by the slimy mouthings of a political faction. He has independence, honor, manhood, qualities which do not enter largely into the character of bulldozers. Had he dropped into the ways or midnight-bowlers, and tossed his hat with those who almost totally ignore church and church offairs, he would have gained the plaudit of a bigoted few. Lies and insinuations will fail, but we regret it will be after we have lost an honored citizen.

Business Changes.

Our jolly barber, Billy Edgerton, has associated with him in his tonsorial business, Mr. Hod. Cutscher, who is an expert in that line. Billy and Hod. will make a good team.

Mitch. Houston has completed his new market, and now serves his customers with good meat, as he always has, from new counters and new racks. Call in and see his new premises.

Our new county treasurer, Mr. Lafe Miller, took charge of his office last Saturday, and Mr. Gonser retired to his farm in north Smithfield. Mr. Frank Ryan will assist Mr. Miller until he gets the run of the business.

The firm of F. N. Wright & Co., lumber dealers in this place, dissolved last week; Mr. Lewis retiring. Since then, Mr. Lewis and Mr. Morris Widney have purchased the yard and stock, and will continue the business at the old stand. Mr. Lute Wright will remove to Michigan in the spring.

Beware! Beware!

A gentleman writes us from Spencerville to the effect that the intimacy existing between a certain male citizen and a married woman of that place, whose names he gives, but which, for prudential reasons, we withhold, is of such a nature as violates the seventh paragraph of the decalogue, and offends the virtuously inclined people of the neighborhood. The husband of this unholy spouse is much exasperated, over this naughty affair, and it is rumored that if the "nest-hiding" is persisted in, that direful consequences will result, compared to which the Conkling-Sprague difficulty will not be a circumstance. In the interest of peace, therefore, we suggest that the parties referred to let up immediately.

129th Re-union.

At a meeting of the survivors of the 129th Ind. volunteer infantry, held at Waterloo, Ind., June 10, 1880, a society organization was perfected, and Col. B. A. Zollinger elected president, and Adjutant E. G. Melendy, secretary, when the follow was unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That a re-union of the survivors of the 129th Ind. volunteer infantry be held at the city of Ft. Wayne, on the 30th day of November, 1880, and that all survivors of said regiment are earnestly and cordially invited to be present.

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to furnish the different newspapers of the 12th congressional district a copy of the proceedings of this meeting for publication.

—Next week will be Thanksgiving, and the gobbler of twenty winters will be in the market at eight cents a pound.

* * *

—Fred. Davis went down to Fort Wayne Tuesday to attend the wedding of Miss Addie Orff and Mr. Frank McKennie.

—The postoffice will be closed on Thanksgiving day from 10 o'clock a. m. to 4 p. m.

—I wish to purchase 15,000 hickory spokes at once. Call and see me.

D. D. SNYDER.

—D. D. Snyder shipped out $3,100 worth of hubs to Toledo this week. How is that for business?

—Arbuckle's Ariosa roasted coffee. Anchor roasted coffee at McQuiston & Ralston's. 46-3w.

—The snow should be kept cleared off of the sidewalks. Its "pulling hard against the stream" for the ladies to get along.

—The Republican office is getting out another advertising almanac. It will make its appearance some time between this and 1882.

—Mrs. H. M. Casebeer, wife of Dr. Casebeer, of this village, died on Wednesday forenoon.—Lagrange Register, Nov. 12.

—Johnny Hartman and his lawn mower have been put away into winter quarters—at least we don't see them around any more.

—Ike Grogg is the champion rabbit hunter. He has caught sixteen of these little animals in two days hunting, besides other game.

—The main force of the Republican office is a little off this week—that is don't feel well, and the editor was compelled to take a stand.

—The boys and dogs are now out each day hunting the festive rabbits. They are said to be plenty. A good rabbit pot-pie don't go bad.

—Erve. Hoffman has agreed to teach the "young idea how to shoot," and will commence next Monday at the first school-house south of Garrett.

—No use talking, for S. U. Tarney keeps the BEST stock of meats and sells more than all others in town, judging from the amount he hauls to his shop.

—Cedar creek presents a nice body of water now, and the average school-boy is waiting patiently for the ice to become solid enough for skating purposes.

—An old salt, when asked how far north he had ever been, replied that he had been so far north "that the cows, when milked beside a red-hot stove, gave ice cream."

—Every boy that is big enough to skate, and has a pair, is out upon the icy sidewalks showing his skill. It is interesting to dodge about between these boys when one is in a hurry.

—The society boys have not organized a dance club yet. Something of an amusing nature should be indulged in to while away these long winter evenings.

—Col. I. P. McConnel, of Angola, dropped in upon us to-day. The colonel is still lively and talkative. He says of our political defeat, "strike the flint and try it again."

—The boot-up-side-down man, W. J. Austin, has been doing a booming business since winter set in. His sales last Monday a week ago were the largest he ever made in one day in Auburn.

—Henry Rehm, formerly a clerk in Frank Hoff's grocery, has returned from Lima, whither he had gone with the expectations of remaining, and will stay in the saloon of Mr. George Wenighoff, on Eight street.

—Hank Long, in starting out with the management of the Kendallville Standard, blows hard and loud about what a good paper he's going to make. We hope it will met the approbation of every citizen in Noble county, but give us a rest on that blowing.

—The ladies of the Presbyterian church will giving a Thanksgiving dinner in the basement rooms of the church. Dinner 35 cents; supper 25 cents. A cordial invitation is extended to all. MRS. J. E. ROSE, Sec'y.

—Trade is apparently good, and consequently the merchants are jubilant. The hitching posts about the public square are lined with teams and the busy stir upon the sidewalks and in the stores go to make things lively and pleasant.

—The COURIER, as will be seen, is now directing its attention more to the local and general news of the day, and thrown politics to one side. We are really publishing more reading matter than is financially to our benefit, but our large list of subscribers will appreciate our efforts and hard labor in doing so.

—We have a light run of sleighing to-day which gives wood-choppers and farmers a good chance to get their wood bolts, heading and hub blocks into market. Our factories are suffering for want of material, men and boys are idle, and a with a good run of sleighing the hum of industry would ring in our ears.

—The mutton-headed Teutonic who sells peanuts a few blocks from the postoffice, should never undertake to write for the press again. He made an ass of himself last week.

—We notice that the county farm has purchased a fine looking colt to drive beside their celebrated gray horse. That's business; the gray is too fine a looking animal to have a mule for a partner.

—Now the blacksmith feels independent, and don't care whether school keeps or not. The horses must have shoes on, and the sleds must be repaired, and the continual ring of the anvil is heard throughout the land.

—The season of the year has arrived when the matrimonial market is generally lively. We wish to inform our young friends that we have wedding stationery of the latest styles and at reasonable prices.

—We heard a number of persons inquiring for wood this week. What a great mistake men of families make by not getting their winter supply of fuel during the summer. It is much cheaper to buy wood ranked up than it is to get it upon the street by the load.

—Complaint comes from all along the railroads that cars enough can not be had to ship the wheat out of the country. There is a complaint here, also. Mr. Isaac Ochs, one of our extensive wheat buyers last Monday had over 7,900 bushels of wheat at the Jackson elevator, awaiting shipment.

—We have not had any fires as yet, this winter, but this is no reason why we should become careless and indifferent. Everyone should be careful, see that the stove-pipe is fastened securely, and watch well where the ash-bucket is emptied. A little caution sometimes will prevent a destructive fire.

—Our esteemed county treasurer, Mr. Daniel Gonser, turned over his office last Saturday to his successor, Mr. Lafe Miller, and has retired to the more congenial persuits of agriculture. Mr. Gonser has made an efficient and honest officer, and steps out with a conscience void of offence, and with the good will of his constituents.

—The Corunna Headlight contains this mention of one of our citizens: "Isaac Ochs, for many years a leading merchant of Butler, has removed his stock of goods to Auburn and opened a mammoth store in Ford's block. Mr. Ochs is a practical, wide-a-wake merchant, and he will command a large share of the county trade."

—Our agricultural ware-rooms present a deserted appearance now. The proprietors are taking things easy, so to speak. The trade, however, during the season just past, has been very profitable to the dealers, and all are well satisfied. The crops depend upon the success of this business, and we are informed by our rural friends that the wheat promises well. Everything looks favorable for another year.

—Now, the sturdy farmer has his time for rest, after toiling hard through the long summer months. His wheat and oats are threshed and in the bin, his corn is husked and placed away in the crib, and the faithful tiller-of-the-soil is at rest. He sits by the fireside and looks out upon the broad, green wheat fields with an independent smile, his swine are fattened and ready for the market, and where can you find a more happy or prosperous people than the industrious farmer?

—Mr. Oberlin, the newly-elected republican county commissioner signifies his intention to pay his part of the livery expense of the county commissioners out of his own pocket. If Mr. Oberlin would go a little farther and work for nothing and board himself, he would more surely gain the plaudit of Well done good and faithful servant, thou hast been faithful over the county affairs, we will boost thee up higher. He will probably get tired of that kind of reform before his term expires.

Neighborhood Nippings.

Columbia City Post: The republican press of this district are trying to work up a boom for Judge Taylor, of Fort Wayne, for the United States senatership. Nixy, Taylor.

Kendallville Standard: Noble county is a tie, politically, the vote for Garfield and Hancock being the same, to a ballot. This places both parties in the county on a healthy fighting basis, and it will be lively in the future.

Fort Wayne News: The population of Fort Wayne, according to the renumeration will be about 27,400. This number does not include residents of Spy Run avenue or South Wayne, though both sections are practically a part of the city, although they pay no city taxes.

Larwill Blade: There are several cases of election bribes coming before the grand jury at its next session. Any person knowing that he has either directly or indirectly offered any money or any valuable consideration for a vote can prepare to meet the indictment.

Ligonier Banner, Nov. 11: Wm McDowell, a leading farmer of Harrison township, Elkhart county, was seriously injured on Wednesday forenoon of last week, by the bursting of a circular saw, while engaged in sawing wood. One piece struck him in the forehead, cutting a gash four inches long and penetrating the brain; both thumbs were cut off and his hands badly injured. His recovery is doubtful.

Lafayette Courier: Charlie Munson, who for the past two terms has been sheriff of Allen county, turned over the keys to his successor Saturday, the 6th. The entire press of Ft. Wayne pronounce him the best sheriff Allen county ever had, and give him great and well-deserved praise for his admirable administration of the affairs of his office. Charlie is a genial fellow, and has many friends here who wish him success in his future undertakings.

Goshen was visited by a most disastrous fire last Tuesday, Nov. 16, that swept over a portion of the business blocks. The fire started in the building of the Goshen Manufacturing Company, consuming that institution, the saw-mill of Albright & Davis, the blacksmith shop and residence of M. Bashor, large frame double business block of Harris & Co., Dayton, O., occupied by Christian Weilet, grocer; the office of the Goshen pump company; the double brick business building owned by Mrs. Hatt, of this city, and Mrs. H. E. Beufort, of Ligonier, and occupied by H. L. Reeves, grocer and Jacob Hattle, agent for the Cincinnati buggy company; the tenement house of Joseph Lauferty, five barns and a number of warerooms. Loss, about $35,000. The insurance is divided among the followiug companies: Star, of New York, about $4,000; Imperial and Northern, $5,000; British American, $3,000; American Central, of St. Louis, $8,000; Manhattan, of New York, $2,000.

—The Waterloo Press says: "The Winifred club re-organized Monday night, and elected officers as follows: W. B. Johnson, president; A. P. Haskin, vice president; Clark Long, secretary; Burt Yant, treasurer; Herman Boozer, G. W. Morrell, C. W. Gillett, executive committee; John M. Somers, A. P. Haskin, floor-managers; W. B. Johnson, John A. Knott, alternates. The first hop of the club took place Wednesday evening, the 17th instant."

—Again we learn that D. D. Snyder has purchased the property on South Main street, known as the Blair residence. He will take immediate steps to have it repaired. This is one of the most desirable lots in town, surrounded with beautiful shade trees, and contains a well-selected orchard. Mr. Snyder will make a grand mistake if he cuts away the trees and moves the building westward. It is now located very nicely, away from the noise and dust of the streets that surround it.

WHERE LIES PEACE?

BY DR. [illegible]

Like the flower in an oasis of some arid desert,
Far away from all the haunts of busy man,
She came, with the bloom of youth upon her,
And her charms were like the diamond's light
Which glisten in the moonbeams of our night!

But there are many predestined curses hanging o'er
This Adamic race, which keeps pace with Father time,
Step by step, through the dark but visible years
That are seen imaginatively by the eyes of man—
Which come to us as day-dreams, time and again!

Where are thy charms, oh life? Thy desolation is
But the wafting breeze of the forthcoming era
That gallops o'er the [illegible] of old time,
Gliding with the waves of disquietude and scorn
And carrying with it desolation of the vap'ry morn!

Where is thy peace, oh life? Behold
The granite imbedded deep in mother earth,
Or in the flotsam, a jewel of much worth.
There, as the precious ore, without man's art,
Lies peace, the jewel, imbedded in the heart!

[illegible], Ill.

THE CREMONESE VIOLIN.

It was on a magnificent August evening, in the year 1843, if I remember rightly, when, returning from a tour to the Taunus, I found myself on the Castle Hill of Homburg, under the Heights.

The sun was just sinking behind the foot hills of the "Old King," when, turning my eyes from its fading glories to the Wetterau, my ears were struck by a sound of silver tones.

I was lying in the grass, behind a jasmine bush, and was, therefore, concealed from the view of two interesting young girls, of about 14 and 11 years, elegantly and tastefully attired, who sat themselves down just below me.

"Is this not entrancing, Maria?" spoke the oldest, a tall, black-eyed beauty, to her younger sister, a slender, pale child, who reminded me of Murillo's angel faces. "Oh! how I would like to remain here in Homburg! Neither in England, France, nor Spain did we find it so beautiful."

"You are right, Theresa," answered the little angel; "it is beautiful, and, during the last eight days, I have felt so much better. The pure air on the Rhine hills and the magnificent scenery have done me good; but I am homesick—I long for our beloved Savigliana."

A storm of tears followed these words, spoken in a sobbing and painfully-agitated manner.

"There, you are crying again, Marietta!" exclaimed the older sister, half reprovingly, and pressing her to her side. "In six or eight weeks you will be at home. For two long years we have endured the separation, have longed for home, and never believed that we could live to see it again, and now, almost on the eve of departure, you lament."

"I am very much afraid, Theresa dear; I believe homesickness will consume me!" sobbed the little one.

"You are a dear child, Marietta," answered the older sister. "You will, for my sake, conceal your sorrow. See! would it not grieve me deeply if the Public—"

"Um Gottes willen, be quiet, Theresa!" exclaimed the little one, with all the signs of fear, and suddenly ceasing her sobbing. "No; I will subdue my feelings; the Public shall never have cause to complain."

For a time the sisters were silent. The sun had sunk behind the hills, and a rising fog was slowly darkening the landscape.

"Come, Marietta," said the oldest, "the evening air will hurt you."

Silently the two went, arm in arm, down the Castle Hill, not perceiving that some one was following them, who had been listening to their conversation, and who, touched to the heart, was anxious to discover how that spectre, the Public, influenced their lives.

We soon reached the streets of the city. The first conjectures, that the two girls were perhaps attached to the circus at that time performing in Frankfurt, or were members of the ballet of the Court Opera of Wiesbaden, appeared doubtful. Their articles and elegant costume bore witness against it. If the little one had not mentioned Savigliona, but, perhaps, Birmingham or Roubaix as their home, and if that word, the public, had not fallen from their lips in such a peculiar "pregnant-with-fate" manner, I would have found nothing remarkable about them. But Italians of distinction are a rarity on the Rhine. I had a conundrum before me.

"Look, Theresa!" said the little angel, "there in the window hangs a harp."

I had approached the sisters when we reached the city so near that no word was lost to me.

"There is, indeed," answered the older; "but see! there are also violins! Let us go nearer."

It was a small shop that I knew well, in whose two dirty show-windows cotton goods, stationery, toys and musical instruments were displayed in artistic disorder.

Ephraim and Isidor Hirsch was the firm. Ephraim, the older brother, had inherited from his paternal sire the talent to buy and sell, and cultivated the same in a moderate way. Isidor, on the other hand, became a disciple of art, and had in the course of years advanced to the position of a member of the orchestra in the Frankfurt Theater.

He was a musician—second violin—always an unappreciated genius, and had remained assistant to the first violin desk until one evening his patience gave out. On the following morning he bade adieu to the leader of the orchestra and his artistic career.

"What for shall I let myself be abused?" said Isidor Hirsch to his companions; "can I not have it easier and better? I will go to Ephraim." And he went. His brother received him with open arms, and delivered to him the "Portfolio of Interior," the "Books," while he himself attended to the outside, the "Business."

"Ephraim, this I will tell you," began Isidor, on the first day of his entrance into the business; "I cannot be entirely untrue to art. From to-day the business must carry musical instruments."

"What shall I say to that?" answered Ephraim, in the first ecstasy of brotherly feelings. "For your sake I will make the acquisition, but I shall have nothing further to do with it. I have no knowledge of the article."

As I passed the two sisters, the younger said, enthusiastically: "It is surely a Cremonese, Theresa. Just look at the high cover. Let us enter."

I slipped into the shop; gave the admonishing Ephraim a confidential wink, and stood aside to make room for the sisters.

"What will it please you?" asked Ephraim, with business zeal, and reaching for the box containing buttons and pins. Tourists always need buttons and pins.

"We would like to look at the violin that hangs there in the window," answered the oldest, "and, perhaps, buy it."

"You shall have one little brother, who shall on the violin learn to play?" said Ephraim, as he passed the button-box back to its place. "Then can you have one very cheap, for $5."

"No, No," said Marietta, eagerly, "we want to see that particular one that hangs there in the corner."

"You will find that too dear, little lady," answered Ephraim, in a fatherly way. "Do you know that that is a treasure? What do I say—a treasure? A crime it is, by Isidor, that he paid so much for an old violin. The others are much better. Shall I show you one? Five dollars apiece, all new and painted a pretty red color! They are very pretty."

"Come, Marietta!" said Theresa, impatiently, "let us go—"

"Gott, du gerechter! stay! stay!" exclaimed Ephraim, perplexed. "Why will you go? I will show it to you. No; I will not show it. Isidor shall show it to you. "Isidor!" he called, through a small window in the rear door—"Isidor, the Cremonese!" and, turning toward us, he said, in a mixed tone of vexation and rejoicing, and still eying the sisters suspiciously: "I did not think that Isidor would win. When he brought it and said to me: 'Ephraim, I have bought it, and the man will come for the money this afternoon—it costs $150!' No, wait a moment, I mistake, it cost $250—what do I say? Three hundred and fifty dollars I believe it cost. Then I said:

"'Isidor, what a fool you are? Who will buy it? Where lies the value? You are unpractical for the business! You have been cheated!'

"Then he swore, high and low, that only an artist like himself could judge. And when I said again, 'No one will inquire for it, no one will buy it,' then he bet me $5 that he would sell it in a short time.

"If you buy it, then Isidor has won. Shall I not show you the Oberlander, the pretty red ones, only $5 apiece?"

In the meantime Isidor had entered the shop, and comprehended the situation at a glance. He pushed his talkative brother aside, and, bowing to me in passing, he gravely made the sisters a stiff bow.

"You wish to see the violin?" he asked, and, without awaiting the answer, he moved toward the show window in visible excitement. "It is dear, very dear; but just hear the tone!" said he, tuning the violin, and drawing the bow in long strokes across the single strings. Does it not sound like an organ?"

Isidor was now the artist again. In calm moments he had often regretted having given up his career, and if now and then he played, even hours at a time, what satisfaction was that to him? He had not the public before him.

But now? The boldest and most daring evolutions were child's play to him. One cadence followed another wilder and wilder, certainly also more incorrectly than the previous one, and, when he had finished the introduction, he broke into a perfect flood of operatic melodies, till at last he finished with the at the time new piece of Meyerbeer, "Yes, Gold is Only a Chimera."

With an applause-thirsty gesture, he laid down the violin.

Poor Isidor! The public remained quiet and unmoved. Theresa had smiled and Marietta laughed aloud at the mechanical strokes and unlucky passages, which, however, Isidor had taken as signs of approval.

"I have not been able to form an opinion on the quality of the tone," said Theresa. "Will you try the instrument once, Marietta? I will be able to judge of the tone much better."

"How? What?" asked Ephraim, astonished; "you are making fun. The little lady already plays the violin?"

"Yes," answered Theresa, smiling; "we both play a little."

"That is right," said Isidor, handing the violin to the little one with friendly nod and encouraging look; "don't be bashful, and play us a piece."

Marietta silently took the instrument, and, placing herself in position, began likewise with long strokes on the open strings.

"The stroking is excellent," remarked Isidor, "you will make a good player; you have a good begin—"

There—what was that? Astonishment forced the words down Isidor's throat.

With the quickness of lightning, a succession of the most brilliant, bell-like tones, in chromatic order, staccato, flew up into the fifth position, and ended there with a brilliant trill fully a minute long, which, first swelling, sounded like the song of the nightingale, and then, gradually decreasing, ended in fairy-like flageolet tones.

Isidor stood there, eyes and mouth wide open.

"The register is excellent, Marietta," said Theresa, joyfully, "but how is it with the Cantilene, in the middle register?"

Marietta again raised the bow, and an extremely melancholy Gondoliera sounded forth from the strings of the old violin, in longing, sorrowful tones.

I leaned against the wall, shut my eyes, and forgot time, place and surroundings. I had heard Paganini several times; he astonished me—his art dazzled me, but Marietta moved me—touched my heart.

The intensity of my feelings brought tears to my eyes.

Ephraim and Isidor Hirsch were turned into statues.

"The Cantilene is good also," said the unmoved young lady. "But now it remains to try the strength and intensity of the tone. There, I will come to your aid, my dear."

She took the violin, and what Isidor had before remarked: "Does it not sound like an organ?" became verified. Not in single tones; no, in full chords flew the sounds from the strings. Not sweet melodies was it the bow enticed from the instrument—wilder, much wilder than Isidor had ever conceived, streamed the tone from the tyrannized instrument. It was like the prelude to a storm; and, as whipped by the furies, in gigantic, powerful tones, the strings again sounded forth Joseph Panny's "Storm," Paganini's celebrated concert piece.

I was overcome.

Theresa laid down the violin. "The instrument is good, very good," said she, "and worth a much higher price than you mentioned before. The tone is uncommonly sweet, as with all Guarneri violins, but it does not possess the magnificence which the Stradivari, particularly the great Antonio, understood so well to give to their instruments. I am looking for a violin of the first rank, and to that class this one cannot lay claim, notwithstanding its many merits."

The sisters prepared to depart.

"You wish an Oberlander? The pretty, red one, for only $5?" asked Ephraim, approaching. Isidor now came to his senses again. He pushed his brother aside. "Fraulein," he began, "what shall I say? Now, for the first time I perceive that I did right when I gave up art for the shop, and I do not now feel the necessity for reproaching myself in my heart for the act; when I again touch the violin, it will only be for the purpose of cleaning it and removing the dust. But now you must tell me your honored names, that I may know to whom I owe it that my conscience is at rest."

The young lady smilingly pulled a card from her pocket, wrote a few words thereon and laid it on the table.

I knew already who these genii were, and, in an elevated frame of mind, walked forth into the pure air, where I could nourish these impressions uninfluenced by oppressive surroundings.

As I was passing out, I heard Isidor read off the names of Theresa and Maria Milanello.*

*The two celebrated violinists, the subject of the above sketch, were the daughters of the painter Josef Milanollo, of Savigliano, near Turin. Theresa, born in 1820, married, in 1857, a Capt. Parmentier. Maria, born in 1832, died in Paris in 1848. It was in the years 1842-43 that the sisters made a professional tour through Germany.

What Voices Indicate.

There are light, quick, surface voices that involuntarily seem to utter the slang, "I won't do to tie to." The man's words may assure you of his strength of purpose and reliability, yet his tone contradicts his speech.

Then there are low, deep, strong voices, where the words seem ground out, as if the man owed humanity a grudge, and meant to pay it some day. That man's opponents may well tremble, and his friends may trust his strength of purpose and ability to act.

There is the coarse, boisterous, dictatorial tone, invariably adopted by vulgar persons, who have not sufficient cultivation to understand their own insignificance.

There is the incredulous tone, that is full of a covert sneer, or a secret "You-can't-dupe-me-sir" intonation.

Then there is the whining, beseeching voice, that says "sychophant" as plainly as if it uttered the word. It cajoles and flatters you; its words, say, "I love you, I admire you; you are everything that you should be."

Then there is the tender, musical, compassionate voice, that sometimes goes with sharp features (as they indicate merely intensity of feeling) and sometimes blunt features, but always with a genuine benevolence.

If you are full of affection and pretense, your voice proclaims it.

If you are full of honesty, strength and purpose, your voice proclaims it.

If you are cold and calm and firm and consistent, or fickle and foolish and deceptious, your voice will be equally truth-telling.

You can not change your voice from a natural to an unnatural tone, without its being known that you are doing so.

Daniel Webster's Humor.

Daniel Webster was a grim humorist. On one occasion, when a Senator who was jeering another for some pedantry said, "The honorable gentleman may proceed to quote from 'Crabbe's Synonyms,' from Walker and Webster—" "Not from Walker and Webster," exclaimed the Senator from Massachusetts, "for the authorities may disagree!" At another time, when he was speaking on the New York Fire bill, the Senate clock began suddenly to strike, and, after it had struck continuously for about fourteen or fifteen times, Mr. Webster stopped and said to the presiding officer, "That clock is out of order, sir—I have the floor." The occupant of the chair looked rebukingly at the refractory timepiece, but in defiance of the officers and rules of the house it struck about forty before the Sergeant-at-Arms could stop it; Mr. Webster standing silent, while every one else was laughing.

On another occasion, while Mr. Webster was addressing the Senate in presenting a memorial, a clerical-looking person in one of the galleries arose and shouted, "My friends, the country is on the brink of destruction! Be sure that you act on correct principles. I warn you to act as your conscience may approve. God is looking down upon you, and if you act on correct principles you will get safely through." He then deliberately stepped back, and retired from the gallery before officers of the Senate could reach him. Mr. Webster was, of course, surprised at this extraordinary interruption; but, when the shrill voice of the enthusiast had ceased, he coolly resumed his remarks, saying, "As the gentleman in the gallery has concluded I will proceed."

Watch the Children's Feet.

Life-long discomfort and sudden death often come to children through the inattention or carelessness of the parents. A child should never be allowed to go to sleep with cold feet; the thing to be last attended to is to see that the feet are dry and warm. Neglect of this has often resulted in a dangerous attack of the croup, diphtheria or a fatal sore throat. Always on coming from school or entering the house from a visit or errand in rainy, muddy or thawy weather, the child should remove its shoes, and the mother herself ascertain whether the stockings are the least damp. If they are, they should be taken off, the feet held before the fire and rubbed with the hands till perfectly dry, and another pair of stockings and another pair of shoes put on. The reserve shoes and stocking should be kept where they are good and dry, so as to be ready at a minute's notice.

DRAWING-ROOM DRINKING.

The Love of Strong Drink Increasing Among Englishwomen.

[London Truth.]

Not long ago a strange scene took place in a pretty garden not a hundred miles from London. The tree-shaded lawn was scattered over with seats, while here and there a bright-colored Persian rug for the special behoof of any guests who object to open-air amusements on account of the "damp grass." To some minds grass is always damp. It was early in the afternoon, and the only tenants of the garden were the servants, who were arranging refreshments upon some tables under the trees. They seemed full of nods and becks, and whispers of apparently mysterious import passed among them. A carriage drives up to the gate, and two ladies, entering, look around for their hostess. The servant who has admitted them goes in search of his mistress, and a few moments afterward a young and beautifully dressed woman issues from the house, her face deeply flushed, her eyes half closed, and her gait uncertain. Just at this moment another carriage drives up, a gentleman and lady being the occupants. They, too, enter the garden gate and advance toward the house across the lawn. As they approach the uncertain, swaying figure of their hostess they look at each other significantly, and the lady says, in a low voice: "I was afraid of this. Where can Mr. X. be to allow her to be seen in this state?" The interpretation of those wild looks, that disordered hair, and these meaningless words, is that Mrs. X is intoxicated, though not sufficiently so to be quite helpless. She wanders about among her guests, her condition, however, being so palpable, so unmistakable, that the majority laugh and titter, while the friendly few pity, though they condemn. The painful scene was ended by the arrival of her husband, whose look of misery, as he led his wife on his arm through the groups of gaily-dressed people into the house, touched even the laughers with pity.

This is no exaggeration of facts. It is, unfortunately, a scene from real life, and, I fear, not an uncommon one. The love of strong drinks appears to be increasing among the educated women of our day. During the season just past, instances of this were so frequent as to lead to the conjecture that a kind of epidemic of drink was pervading those classes of society in which culture, position, and possession of every comfort in life would appear to be a sufficient guarantee against so degrading a vice. "Society" ladies, in fact, live too much upon excitement not to suffer from the inevitable reaction. For a few months in the year they endure continued fatigue in treading the social mill and for the remainder they are a prey to ennui. They try the first dose of chloral as an experiment. "My eyes look so dull and heavy this morning. So-and-so says chloral is such a capital thing; I think I'll try it." In this case, as in that of rouge, it is not "the first step that costs." It is easy enough. But, from an experiment it becomes a practice, and from a practice it develops into a necessity. It is no longer servant, but master. My lady has her half pint of champagne about an hour after breakfast, another at luncheon, a glass of liquor instead of afternoon tea, a regular sequence of wines at dinner, and brandy in her post-prandial coffee. Her chloral in her dressing-room is as permanent and indispensable an arrangement as her bath, and much sooner missed from its usual position than her bible.

Famous Men and Cats.

Our domestic favorites—cats—were not highly thought of in the Middle Ages. They were then looked on as Satanic agents and were burnt alive. In Paris every St. John's Day a number of the abhorred animals were heaped up in baskets and bags in the Place de Greve, to afford an auto-da-fe, the Sovereign himself setting fire to the pile. This practice continued for a long time, the last monarch who officiated in this manner being Louis XIV. The persecutors of the feline race were, no doubt, ignorant of the fact that cats had been the object of superstitious veneration in early times. In Egypt, for instance, the cat was deified as the patron of liberty and a similar respect was shown it throughout nearly the whole of the East. The Turks still regard "Tabby" as the "cleanest" of animals; Mahomet himself, indeed, having had a great liking for cats, it is only natural that all good Mussulmans should profess the same affection.

It is not in the East alone, however, that the feline tribe have managed to acquire a secure and recognized position in society. Many great men have had an inordinate fondness for cats. Richelieu's special favorite was a splendid Angora, his furry confidant's usual resting-place being his Eminence's table, among state documents, books, etc. Montaigne used to obtain relaxation by playing with his cat. Colbert reared half a dozen cats in his private study and taught them, after a lengthy display of patience, to perform all sorts of tricks. Fontenelle was very fond of cats, and used to place a particular old "Tom" in an arm-chair and deliver an oration before him. We must not forget, too, that felis catus supplied Perrault with one of the most attractive subjects of his stories and that under the pen of this admirable story-teller "Puss in Boots" has become an example of the power of work, industry and savior-faire.—Galignani's Messenger.

The Tables Turned.

A Galveston parent has noticed the for some time his eldest son sneaked off before breakfast and came back looking very happy, so he asked him yesterday morning:

"James, do you take a cocktail in the morning?"

"Don't care if I do take another; but, dad, who would have suspected you of keeping the materials in the house all this time without inviting me to join? I'll be blamed if parents won't do to watch now a days."—Galveston News.

The Telegraph.

Some colored philosopher in the crowd remarked that the telegraph could travel fast. Old Uncle Mose spoke up: "Mebbe so, but you can't prove it by dis cullud witness." Jim Webster replied: "You do sumfin, and light out for de interior of de State, and you'll fine out ef de telegraf don't outtrabble yer. I've had some 'sperience in dat ar telegraf line." "Mebbe so," said Old Mose, "but I paid $2 for a message to my boy Jake up in Austin to send $20. Dat's fosh yeahs ago, and de money hasn't got heah yit. Does yer call dat ar quickness?"—Galveston News.

A Woman's Nerve.

The readers of the Express will remember the delivery of Rube Boyce, the stage robber, from the Austin Jail by his wife. Without repeating the story of the escape, and telling of the manner in which it was accomplished, going on to the time that Boyce and his brave wife reached their home in Kimball County, another incident, equally as thrilling as that at Austin, occurred. Mrs. Boyce had determined to stick to her husband. She had released him from the cell where he had been confined by bars of hardened steel, in the center of the capital city of the great State of Texas, and in the face of the armed guards. She loved him, no matter what crime he had committed, and sooner than permit him to fall a victim to the penalty of the law and be taken forever from her she would risk her life to restore him to liberty. She succeeded in her effort, but then of what avail had her efforts to release him been could she not be with him. To remain in the country where she had lived was unsafe, both for her and her husband, for the minions of the law would surely learn of his return, and either recapture him or take his life, and arrest her for releasing him. There was but one safe course to follow, and that was to leave the country. So it was arranged between the man and his wife that they should leave together, and it is reported that immediately upon returning to their home after the escape from the Austin Jail, the highwayman and the brave partner of his bosom mounted each a horse and rode off together. Mrs. Boyce is said to have doffed her female attire, drawn on a pair of trousers, buckled a revolver about her waist, placed a man's hat upon her head, and that thus disguised followed Rube, "for better or for worse," to some region where he may probably never be recognized nor known. There are few women, indeed, who have the nerve that Mrs. Boyce showed, and fewer still who would manifest the faithfulness she did for the man she loved. Her ventures would serve as the text for a thrilling sensational drama or a novel of absorbing interest that would be read with amazement by thousands all over the world. —San Antonio (Texas) Express.

Changes of Life.

Change is the common feature of society—of all life.

The world is like a magic lantern, or the shifting scenes of a panorama. Ten years convert the population of schools into men and women, the young into fathers and matrons, make and mar fortunes, and bury the last generation but one.

Twenty years convert infants into lovers, fathers and mothers, decide men's fortunes and distictions, convert active men and women into crawling drivelers, and bury all preceding generations.

Thirty years raise an active generation from nonentity, change fascinating beauties into bearable old women, convert lovers into grandfathers and grandmothers, and bury the active generation, or reduce them to decrepitude and imbecility.

Forty years, alas! change the face of all society. Infants are growing old, the bloom of youth and beauty has passed away, two active generations have been swept from the stage of life, names once cherished are forgotten, unsuspected candidates for fame have started from the exhaustless womb of nature.

And in fifty years—mature, ripe fifty years—a half century—what tremendous changes occur. How Time writes her sublime wrinkles everywhere, in rock, river, forest, cities, hamlets, villages, in the nature of man and the destinies and aspects of all civilized society.

Let us pass on to eighty years—and what do we desire and see to comfort us in the world? Our parents are gone, our children have passed away from us into all parts of the world to fight the grim and desperate battle of life. Our old friends—where are they? We behold a world of which we know nothing and to which we are unknown. We weep for the generations long since gone by—for lovers, for parents, for children, for friends in the grave. We see everything turned upside down by the fickle hand of fortune and the absolute despotism of time. In a word, we behold the vanity of life, and are quite ready to lay down the poor burden and be gone.

A Useful Instrument.

Undoubtedly, to every well-regulated woman, the hairpin is an invaluable acquisition. She can use it in a variety of ways—as a glove-hook, button-hook, even a gimlet on occasion. It makes an excellent clasp in lieu of a missing buckle. Its most obvious use is to fasten the hair to the head of the wearer. The back hair is always spiked on with from six to twelve hairpins, which hold it so firmly that it cannot be detached until all the hairpins are withdrawn. In like manner the bonnet is pinned to the hair with hairpins. Unlearned men have often wondered how it was possible for a light straw hat to keep its place on the very summit of a pyramid of hair from which the slightest breeze ought, apparently, to be able to blow it. The hairpin is the solution of this mystery. Being made of the finest quality of wrought iron, and strengthened by paint with as much care as the elevated railroad piers, it can defy anything but a cyclone; and a bonnet fastened with half a dozen hairpins becomes as much a part of the wearer as her back hair. In every sense it is an instrument of wondrous power.

On Dangerous Ground.

Miss Younglady owned to twenty-four, but not a year more. The city's celebration last week awoke her to unwonted enthusiasm as to things military. She naturally began to reminisce. She spoke of the Bunker Hill celebration in 1875; she spoke of the soldiers' return from the war; she spoke of the scenes of military grandeur during the great struggle; she spoke of the rush to arms when the gun at Charleston awoke the nation to its danger. She was going even back of that, when a gentleman remarked, "Let's see, it is nineteen years and over since that gun was fired." That was all he said, but it was sufficient. She was heard to gasp, "How time flies!" and then she fainted dead away. Some men are so wanting in politeness!—Boston Transcript.

VEGETINE

WILL CURE RHEUMATISM.

Rheumatism is a Disease of the Blood; to Cure Rheumatism it must be treated as a Blood Disease.

REV. WM. T. WORTH

Recommends VEGETINE for Rheumatism and Sciatica.

FALL RIVER, Mass., May 18, 1879.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:

Dear Sir—For some years I have been, at times, much troubled with acute attacks of Rheumatism; I especially suffered tortures from Sciatica. By the advice of friends who knew the benefits conferred by VEGETINE, I began its use, and since that time I have had no attack like those I previously suffered. For some time past I have had no return of the trouble, except occasionally a faint intimation, which disappeared upon taking a few doses of the VEGETINE. I also take pleasure in recording my testimony in favor of its excellent effect in abating an inveterate Salt Rheum, and I count it no small pleasure to have been thus made free.

Respectfully, WM. T. WORTH,
Pastor First M. E. Church.

VEGETINE

Has Relieved and Cured Sufferers of Rheumatism by the Thousands.

READ THIS:

If You have Rheumatism, take the Medicine that will Cure You.

BUTLER SWITCH, Jennings Co., Ind.,
May 18, 1879.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:

Dear Sir—Having in our family received great benefit from the VEGETINE manufactured by you, I thought I would give you the facts of the case, hoping it might meet the eye of some suffering one, who might thus be relieved. I have a grandchild about ten years of age, who, two years ago or over, had a severe attack of rheumatism, and for two long years was under the care of as good a physician as we have in this county, and yet all this time grew worse, till we gave her up, and thought she must die. She was much deformed, and we were told by a doctor that, if she lived, she would always be deformed; but, thanks to VEGETINE, she is to-day perfectly well, and as straight as an arrow. Last December we abandoned all hope of the doctor doing anything for her, and commenced using VEGETINE, according to your directions. When the first bottle was used up we could not see much improvement; but we continued on the second bottle, and could see some change for good. She took six bottles, and, thank God, a complete cure was effected in every respect.

Yours truly, G. BURGESS.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

It is reported that 320,000 holes were bored in the execution of St. Gothard tunnel, 980,000 pounds of dynamite consumed, and 1,650,000 drills worn out.

As Sir William Thompson has shown, the sun, if it were composed of solid coal and produced its light by combustion, would burn out in less than 6,000 years.

Tacks.—Two hundred and fifty different kinds of tacks are manufactured from brass, copper, zinc, iron and steel. The material from which tacks are made is first cut into long strips as wide as the required length of the tack. It is then put into a machine which cuts it into tacks or nails, as the case may be, as quickly and as easily as a boy would munch a stick of candy.

The Cunard line has lost two vessels in thirty-seven years, but has never lost a life nor a letter. The Colombia, one of their first vessels, went ashore between Halifax and Boston. The passengers and cargo were landed in safety, but the vessel could not be got off. The Tripoli went ashore near Tuskar, off the coast of Ireland, about six years ago. The passengers and cargo were landed safely, but the vessel was broken up.

"Train catching," says the Hour, "is the cause of more ill health than is generally supposed. Those who 'bolt' their breakfasts, in order to be in time for the morning train, know that such a course leads to dyspepsia, with its attendant ills, and the violent exertion which is made by those who just 'save their distance' produces an excitement of the heart and blood vessels which, if frequently repeated, is likely to end in serious organic disease."

Electricity is used in Paris to control vicious horses. A conducting wire runs from an electro-magnet in the seat of the wagon through the reins to the horse's bits. By turning the crank of the magnet a current of electricity is induced and sent to the animal's mouth. No violent shock is given to benumb or greatly alarm the horse, but the slight prickling sensation peculiar to electrical influence surprises and subdues him. An electric whip, to prevent rearing or turning suddenly, is another ingenious invention.

From inquiries conducted by Prof. Hermann Cohn, of Breslau, since 1865, it appears that short-sightedness is rarely or never born with those subject to it, and is almost always the result of strains sustained by the eye during study in early youth. Myopia, as it is called, is seldom found among pupils of village schools, and its frequency increases in proportion to the demand made upon the eye in higher schools and in colleges. A better construction of school desks, an improved typography of text-books, and a sufficient lighting of class-rooms, are the remedies proposed to abate this malady.

What Shall We Drink?

The editor of the Science discusses at length the value of the different articles of food which generally enter into daily consumption. Chocolate, he says, from its large proportion of albumen, is the most nutritive beverage, but at the same time, from its quantity of fat, the most difficult to digest. Its aromatic substances, however, strengthen the digestion. A cup of chocolate is an excellent restorative and invigorating even for weak persons, provided their digestive organs are not too delicate. Cardinal Richelieu attributed to chocolate his health and hilarity during his later years. Tea and coffee do not afford this advantage. Albumen in tea leaves, and legumin in coffee berries, are represented in very scanty proportions. The praise of tea and coffee as nutritive substances is, therefore, hardly warranted. Tea and coffee, though of themselves not difficult of digestion, tend to disturb the digestion of albuminous substances by precipitating them from their dissolved state. Milk, therefore, if mixed with tea or coffee, is more difficult of digestion than if taken alone, and coffee alone without cream promotes digestion after dinner by increasing of the dissolving juices. The volatile oil of coffee and the empyreumatic and aromatic matters of chocolate accelerate the circulation, which, on the other hand is calmed by tea. Tea and coffee both excite the activity of the brain and nerves. Tea, it is said, increases the power of digesting the impressions we have received, creates a thorough meditation, and, in spite of the movements of thoughts, permits the attention to be fixed on a certain subject. On the other hand, if tea is taken in excess, it causes an increased irritability of the nerves, characterized by sleeplessness, with a general feeling of restlessness and trembling of the limbs. Coffee, also, if taken in excess, produces sleeplessness and many baneful effects very similar to those arising from tea-drinking. Coffee, however, produces greater excitement, and a sensation of restlessness and heat ensues. For throwing off this condition fresh air is the best antidote.

Effect of Tea on the Skin.

If you place a few drops of strong tea upon a piece of iron, a knife blade, for instance, the tannate of iron is formed, which is black. If you mix tea with iron filings, or pulverized iron, you can make a fair article of ink. If you mix it with fresh human blood, it forms with the iron of the blood the tannate of iron. Take human skin and let it soak for a time in strong tea, and it will become leather. Now, when we remember that the liquids which enter the stomach are rapidly absorbed by the venous absorbents of the stomach, and enter into the circulation and are thrown out of the system by the skin, lungs, and kidneys, it is probable that a drink so common as tea, and so abundantly used, will have some effect. Can it be possible that tannin, introduced with so much liquid-producing perspiration, will have no effect upon the skin? Look at the tea-drinkers of Russia, the Chinese, and the old women of America, who have so long continued the habit of drinking strong tea. Are they not dark-colored and leather-skinned?

Solar Force.

Several years ago Ericsson predicted that the Nile and the Ganges would be lined with cotton and other factories driven by solar heat. A French engineer in Algiers is already contributing to its fulfillment by pumping water and making it boil by solar force alone. He will probably soon be raising, roasting and boiling coffee at one operation.

One of Rosseau's Jokes.

Rosseau went into a grocer's shop and said:

"Have you any eight candles?"

"Yes, sir; we sell a good many of them. You see there are more poor people than rich in the world."

"Ah!" said Rosseau, "I see you are more than a grocer—you are an observer."

"O, sir!" said the grocer, flattered; "then you want, sir—"

"An eight candle, please."

"Only one, sir?"

"One to begin with; I'll see about more afterward."

The candle was produced, and Rosseau said:

"Will you kindly cut it in two?"

This was done, and he then said:

"Now would you kindly cut the two halves into four?"

"Into four, sir?"

"Yes; for my purpose I want eight small pieces of candle."

"There they are."

"One moment; would you kindly make a wick to each piece? And now can you oblige me with a match?"

This being done, Rosseau stuck the eight pieces in a line on the counter and lighted them.

"May I ask what you are doing?" said the grocer.

"O!" said Rosseau, "it is a joke."

"A joke?"

"Yes; and, having made it, I wish you good-day."

As he left the shop the grocer ran after him, crying:

"But you haven't paid me for the candle!"

"If I did," replied Rosseau, "where would be the joke?"

OHIO AT WORK.

[From the Marietta Register.]

Our State having secured the highest honor of the late convention—the nominee for President—we must begin the work of electing the native to the Presidency. Lest this prove too much for those engaged in it, the following from Mr. T. Triem, our popular druggist, will afford a suggestion of relief: I take pleasure adding to the numerous testimonials regarding the efficacy of Hamburg Drops. I sell largely of the remedy; it gives better satisfaction than any other medicine. So many remarkable cures by its use have come to my notice, that I deem it a duty to testify in its behalf.

Paying for His Whistle.

Not many years ago, when a lofty building was on the point of completion, the mason was in the habit of whistling to the laborer who attended him whenever he wanted a fresh supply of lime, and, as the scaffold on which he wrought was rather small, this occurred very often during a day's job. A joiner, who was fitting in a window immediately underneath, noticing Pat answer dutifully to every call from the mason, thought of playing a trick on him by imitating the whistle, and thus brought him up with a hodful of lime when there was no room for it. The mason told Pat that he had not whistled, so he had no other alternative than to trudge back with his load. This having occurred the third time during the day, Pat thought he would watch to hear where the whistle came from.

He had not waited long with the hod on his shoulder when he heard the identical whistle underneath where he stood, and, leaning over, he saw the head of the joiner protruding out of the window immediately below. Pat, without more ado, emptied the hod right over the whistler's head. The joiner yelled and sputtered while attempting to clear himself from the adhesive mass; and, in the midst of his confusion, heard Paddy above shouting at the top of his voice:

"Whistle when you want some more mortar."

Boston Police Memoranda.

[From the Boston Weekly Globe.]

Geo. E. Savory, Esq., Asst. Police Clerk, refers to a case of agonizing sciatic suffering of frequent occurrence, and which was cured by St. Jacobs Oil in less than half an hour.

The Old Songs.

In the old songs there was invariably a display of workmanship of a respectable kind, and occasionally the skill of the writer rose above the respectable level, while in a literary sense the new songs are for the most part contemptible. If the texture of those now silent ditties was occasionally coarse, it was entirely free from all unwholesome savor. The fun in them was the rough fun of back-slapping, rib-punching farces of the period. Robust, and not seldom clumsy, humor, but—unquestionably humble, "John Jones," "The Burial Club," "The Cork Leg," "Never buy Tripe on a Friday," and many other unctuous tol-de-rol ditties whose titles do not readily recur—they are in the memory locked, but the key is for the moment mislaid—served as a lyrical safety-valve for the boisterous animal spirits of the time, the like of which we are unhappily not provided with in the year 1880.—Tinsley's Magazine.

Three Dog Stories.

A Columbus (Ind.) dog caught the tie strap of a running horse, and brought him to a standstill, holding him until the driver came up.

As a Canandaigua, N. Y., mother was about to strike her little daughter, who she thought merited a whipping, the Newfoundland dog of the family caught the menacing arm in his mouth, but did not bite. The father, coming in at the moment, made a pretence of punishing the child, when his arm was arrested the same way.

A dog of Eddyville, Ky., entered a burrow a long distance after a rabbit, and in enlarging the hole threw the dirt behind him, and closed up his retreat. Eighteen days afterward a son of its owner thought he heard a dog bark or howl underground, and, after digging down several feet, the animal was discovered. He suffered no serious injury from his long confinement and fast.

A young lady ate half a wedding cake, and then tried to dream of her future husband. Now she says she would rather die than marry the man that she saw in that dream.

The greatest anxiety is experienced lest there should be a flaw in the title to property; yet a flaw in the title of health—a Cough or Cold—is disregarded. Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup removes all such at once.

CLERKS.

[New Haven Register.]

How difficult it is to distinguish them from proprietors until you are used to them! Then it is easy. Proprietors wear clothes that clerks wouldn't be seen wearing to sift ashes in.

At the start clerks always speak of themselves as "salesmen." They have a faint idea that the latter is a dictionary word and means something.

The king clerk is the "floor-walker." He's a drum major without bearskin cap or baton, and fills an important position in an important manner. Poor humanity always feels its knees quake before his awful presence, until he says, "Shows these ladies-them hose," and it is proved that he is mortal.

The active clerk shows all the goods in his department, talks a steady stream and wears a customer out. He makes a few sales and does not stay long in a place.

The listless clerk, with drooping eyes and pale necktie, drops the goods on the counter in a don't-care-a-tive sort of a way, wearied by the exertion, and the customer trades with him because he is so refreshingly lazy.

The average clerk comes up town in the morning the very ideal of spick-span newness. He is fresh every day, his collar and shirt front are just from the smoothing-iron, his clothes are molded to his form and his hair looks as if his good, kind grandmother, had slicked it down with bear's grease. He is a daisy.

The poorly-dressed clerk: There are no facts in regard to this nonentity.

The "masher" as a clerk: He is engaged because of his superlative attraction to silly women, who call on him every day and buy some little knick-knack in order to bask in the sunshine of his radiant and charming smile.

A genial clerk, a man who is too good for his position and a positive addition to a well-regulated establishment. One clerk of this sort is worth a whole store full of average clerks. He sells goods before you know you have bought them.

The genuine business man sometimes begins life as a clerk, but he pushes out of the position in an amazing hurry.

The lady clerk: Who would be so ungallant as to say she is not interesting? She is. Gentlemen always like to trade at the counter where she presides, and she is usually assigned to a department where they are sure to come on little errands. Ladies, on the contrary, do not like to purchase of her, and it is noticeable that she is seldom in the dress goods department.

There are a great many variety of clerks—drug clerks, grocery clerks, and ten thousand others. They are the ornamental and somewhat useful mile-posts on the highway of business. They seem to be a necessity, but why they should carry the world in its entirety on their shoulders, and superintend the progress of the planets in their orbits, is a mystery. But they all do it; or, at least think they do.

The Tomb of Themistocles.

As if to have stood on the Plain of Marathon was not enough for one day's delight, we must needs start off after dinner (and by train, too, on the only railway in Greece!) to the Piræus, to pay our homage to the last resting place of the man who, whatever his faults, was the first to see what Athens had it in her to accomplish, and to open her eyes and guide her hands to the fulfillment of her destiny.

Making our way as best we could in the darkness past the shipping and the dock-yards, then through the straggling houses which lie above the harbor to the seaward, and where, each house being provided with a fierce and obstreperous dog, we had some difficulty in escaping with a whole skin, we at length came out upon a narrow footpath leading through waste moorland along the sea shore.

A scramble of five minutes or so through the rough bowlders brought us to a point where the coast line turned slightly southward, and left us looking across southwest to the Island of Salamis and the mountains of the Morea. Hard by lies the Athenian. His tomb commands the scene of the battle, which rivals the fame of Marathon, and which would hardly have been fought at all save for him. Hitherto the night had been dark, and the moon chary of her light; but now, as we looked, she shone forth triumphantly, and amid flocks of white cloudlets, which here and there relieved the blue-blackness of the heavens. At our feet gleamed the dark waters of the gulf, just trembling in the breeze, and beyond the gleam the cone of Ægina, the "eye-sore of the Piræus." Behind Ægina, and sweeping round to to right, loomed the Argolis and Achaia. Nearer at hand lay Salamis, her jagged outline well defined against the sky. Between her and the shore little Psyttaleia, whose name lives in the record of the battle, asserted its existence by the steady ray from its light-house shining across the mouth of the harbor. Looking inland, the lights of the Piræus added to the scene fresh interest, both of picturesqueness and of association, as showing that, not less now than in old days, the place was full of the stir and hum of men.—Blackwood's Magazine.

Arousing Its Readers.

An alarm of fire at midnight is a startling thing, but not half so startling to many who hear it as would be the sudden knowledge of their own dangerous physical condition. Thousands of thousands are hurrying to their graves because they are carelessly indifferent to the insidious inroads of disease and the means of cure. It is the mission of H. H. Warner & Co., with their Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, to arouse men to a sense of their danger and then cure them.—Memphis Appeal.

Iowa men never stop to figure, or one of them would not have prepared fifty pounds of powder to blow up a man weighing 112 pounds. One pound of powder will lift 500 pounds of man every time.

Rheumatism.—Rheumatism is a disease of the blood. The blood in this disease is found to contain an excess of fibrin. Vegetine acts by converting the blood from its diseased condition to a healthy circulation. One bottle of Vegetine will give relief; but, to effect a permanent cure, it must be taken regularly, and may take several bottles, especially in cases of long standing. Try it, and your verdict will be the same as that of thousands before you, who say: "I never found so much relief as from the use of Vegetine," which is compounded exclusively of barks, roots and herbs.

Lion and Dog.

Lions, when confined in cages, do not object to the presence of rats. These are often seen gnawing the bones off which the lions have dined. In illness the case is different, for the ungrateful rats begin to nibble the toes of the lord of the forest before his death, and considerably to his discomfort. "To save our lioness from this annoyance," said a London showman, "we placed in her cage a fine little rat tan-terrier, who was at first received with a surly growl, but when the first rat appeared and the lioness saw the little terrier toss him in the air, catching him with professional skill across the loins with a snap as he came down, she began to understand what the terrier was for; she coaxed him to her side, folded her paw around him, and each night the little terrier slept at the breast of the lioness, enfolded by her paws, and watching that his natural enemies did not disturb the natural rest of his mistress. The rats had a bad time during those six weeks."

Different from Boston.

The Boston Courier tells of a very hard drinker who reformed, joined the church, and became very pious. One day as he was leaving church some one pointed at him and said that he must be as drunk as usual. He heard the remark and went off on a spree, and has been a hard drinker ever since. A somewhat similar instance occurred not long ago in Chicago. A very easy drinker who reformed to such an extent that he became a Baptist, was pointed out one day as he was leaving church by a person who said that he must be drunk. He overheard the remark, and, after wiping the floor with his traducer a few times, went off to find some other member of the family to practice on until his real opponent got well. Chicago must be different from Boston.—Chicago Tribune.

Abstemiousness as a Cure-All.

Dr. Frank Perry, a prominent Boston physician, in an interview regarding the Tanner fast, told a Herald reporter: "If a person would find out just what his system craves, and what his digestive organs can deal with profitably and successfully, and take that food never in excess of these conditions, then, the medical fraternity would find a great part of their occupation gone. Nine-tenths of all the pains and aches, the disorders, cardiac affections, melancholies, irregularities—call them or class them as one may—result from overloaded, overtaxed digestive organs. A 200 pound man, doing a hard day's work, mental and physical, every day, will find that, with a bit of steak the size of his two fingers, a single slice of toast, and one cup of coffee or tea at a meal, 'day in and day out'—reference is now made to quantity and not to kinds or qualities—he can do more work, keep up to the maximum of his strength and general health, and actually increase constantly in buoyancy of spirits and bodily powers. The testimony is universal and absolutely uniform wherever this experiment is tried. Of course, there must be a remedy for defective health, a foundation of soundness upon which to build the new structure of daily life, but these will be more readily attained in conjunction with the practice of abstemiousness, and the reform itself largely contains the conditions of its own success.

Without doubt the body, habituated to indulgences unlimited, will rebel for a time against the establishment of such a reformation; but the struggle will be short, and soon the matter will be decided in a perfectly natural way. Even the method of eating will become revolutionized. Nature has ordained that even in the process of mastication of food, there is satisfaction of the natural appetite, and one who is observing in this respect may be surprised at the developments of his own experiment. A half pound of beefsteak bolted in the ordinary boarding-house style—'family style' would be equally descriptive—is almost certain to be the precursor of an olla podrida of meats and vegetables, and condiments and pastry, the share of which falling to one man ought to be sufficient to vitual a neighborhood for a time—many of the articles ought never to be eaten at all by sensible, conscientious persons. But a bit of nicely broiled steak, eaten by a person who knows very well that, when that is dispatched, his meat is ended, and also means to make the most of the eating, will be disposed of in a far different manner. It will be thoroughly and slowly masticated, the eater keeping time with his table companions, and there will be plenty of lively and pleasant conversation and by-play between the mouthfuls. Once used to such meals and such disposition of them, the sensible man, who eats to live, will forget he has a stomach, or at least, he will never know anything of its existence through those disagreeable reminders which torture humanity daily and hourly, and frustrate half the effective work of the world.

TO THE AFFLICTED.

Since the introduction of Kellogg's Columbian Oil, it has made more permanent cures and given better satisfaction on kidney complaints and rheumatism than any known remedy. Its continued series of wonderful cures, in all climates, has made it known as a safe and reliable agent to employ against all aches and pains, which are the forerunners of more serious disorders. It acts speedily and surely, always relieving suffering and often saving life. The protection it affords by its timely use on rheumatism, kidney affection, and all aches and pains, wounds, cramping pains, cholera morbus diarrhoea, coughs, colds, catarrh, and disorders among children, makes it an invaluable remedy to be kept always on hand in every home. No person can afford to be without it, and those who have once used it never will. It is absolutely certain in its remedial effects, and will always cure when cures are possible. Call at Casebeer & Matheny's and get a memorandum book giving more full details of the curative properties of this wonderful medicine.84-1y

A Government Clerk Succeeds in Stealing $59 000 in Three Years—Method of Operation.

NEW YORK, November 11.—Henry Freeman, late chief clerk in the local steamboat inspector's office in this city, arrested yesterday, was arraigned before United States Commissioner Shields, to-day, to answer to a charge of making false entries in the books of the office, and thereby defrauding the government out of various sums aggregating $59,000. He had sole charge of the entries of steamboat certificates, issued by the office, and his speculations have been going on about three years, during which time he had made 590 fraudulent entries. Freeman has been in the habit of receiving money paid for licenses, but, in making an entry, would keep the number of license down and pocket the money. He was accidently discovered by Inspector Blackwith, of the New London, Conn. office, who, upon examining an old license issued to the captain of steamer Narragansett, discovered that the number was too high, and notified the local inspectors, who began an investigation and discovered the discrepancies of Freeman. He was held in default of $5,000 bail. It is said at the treasury department, Washington, that the government will lose nothing, as local inspectors are responsible for all the money received on account of sales of licenses to officers of steamships, as the inspectors are under personal bond of $10,000 each.

A Blushing Attachment.

[London Telegraph.]

It is not every maiden, in these prosaic days, who can summon the "tell-tale blood" to her cheeks at will, or silently reveal, by an opportune roseate flush, those inward feelings to which many young ladies experience such difficulty in giving verbal expression. But as the value of the blush depends, as a highly effective weapon in the feminine armory, is still recognized by the sex, although it would appear to have somewhat fallen into desuetude. French ingenuity has been at the pains of devising a mechanical appliance for the instantaneous production of a fine natural glow upon the cheek of beauty, no matter how constitutional its proprietress may be. This thoughtful contrivance is called "The Ladies' Blushing Bonnet," to the side ribbons of which—those usually tied under the fair wearer's chin—are attached two tiny but powerful steel springs, ending in round pads, which are brought to bear upon the temporal arteries by the action of bowing the head, one exquisitely appropriate to modest embarrassment, and by artificially forcing blood into the checks cause them to be suffused with "the crimson hue of shame" at a moment's notice. Should these ingenious head coverings become the fashion among the girls of the period, it will behoove "young men about to marry" to take a sly peep behind the bonnet-strings of their blushing charmers immediately after proposing, in order to satisfy themselves that the heightened color, by them interpreted as an involuntary admission of reciprocated affection, is not due to the agency of a carefully adjusted "blushing bonnet."

A Big Sexton.

The decease of the late sexton of Grace church brings in mind the long-time sexton of old Trinity, David Lyons, who died some twenty years ago, and who, like Browne, was quite large in bodily diameter, and very well known in his day. In decorating the church one Christmas he caused a canopy supported by four wreath-twined posts to be erected over the lecturn, giving it very much the appearance of a parrot cage. As a finishing touch to this work of art he proposed an inscription in German text for its front. He thought it best, however, to consult one of the clergy before adding this final embellishment; and it was well that he did, as the sequel will show. To the question, "What do you propose for the inscription?" he replied that inasmuch as the lecturn held the sacred scriptures he thought, "The Bible, the biggest Book in the World," would be eminently appropriate.

"There will be no objection to that" the witty clergyman responded, "if you will put underneath it, "Trinity church the biggest church, and David Lyons the biggest sexton."—Harper's Magazine for December.

Good Times for Farmers.

There has been few times in the history of our country when farmers had as much available money as now. The number of those who are pinched closely is smaller than we ever knew it to be, while thousands who were more or less embarrassed a few years ago are now ready to loan largely. In fact, many have more on hand than they care to use, and are at a loss how to invest it securely and remuneratively. Vast sums could now be borrowed at six per cent., and those ready to loan would be fully satisfied with that figure. All this renders holders much less anxious to part with what they have to sell, and gives them a genuine independence unknown for years. The amount of wool and grain now in the country would bring in a great deal of money, but it is not especially needed, and there is no disposition to sell hurriedly. Would it not be well enough just here to profit a little by past experience? Years of plentiful crops are frequently followed by scarcity, and common prudence prompts to the preparation in times of plenty for times of possible want. Now is a splendid time to pay debts, and if you owe anything, strain a point and pay it. Husband your abundance, keep out of speculative investments, and "make hay while the sun shines." The American people confidently expect a continued agricultural prosperity, and with good reasons. It must not be forgotten, though, that economy has brought the average farmer where he now is, and that it is economy only, in a series of years, which can carry him safely through.

A Dying Child's Last Wish.

[Detroit Free Press.]

At one of the public schools in the northwestern part of the city the pupils are spurred to good behavior and study by cards of merit, a day of perfect behavior being recognized by a fanciful small card. Twenty-four of those cards entitle the pupil to one larger and more ornamental card. Among the pupils was a sweet little girl seven years of age, whose pretty ways and devotion to her lessons had won for her the love and admiration of her school associates, and at the close of each day her name was sure to be read from the roll of honor. A few days since her seat at school was noticed to be vacant, and regrets were expressed on all sides, as it was the first "absent" marked against her. The next day one of her little school-mates brought word that she was detained at home by illness. On the third day the teacher received the following note: "My darling little girl is very sick, and, as I fear, is dying. She has received twenty-two of the small cards of merit, and asked me to send to you to see if you will not send her one of the larger cards, as she is sure she would have been awarded the two cards necessary to receive the larger one had she been able to attend school." The note was read to the pupils, and for a time the scene presented in that school-room was most affecting. Not only was one large card sent to the dying pupil, but eight of them were taken to her by her teacher, and those cards—the full complement for the term—were with the child and seemed a source of infinite comfort to her up to the time of her death. The child was buried on Thursday, and prominent among the many decorations upon the little casket were the cards of merit, pathetically typical of the buried hopes, joys and ambitions of the little one whose last dreams were of success.

Hebrew Immigration.

The little state of Roumania, situated in southeastern Europe, and formerly tributary to Turkey, has an area of 46,708 square miles and a population of about 4,500,000. About 90 per cent, of the population belong to the Greek church, and the remainder are Catholics, Jews and Mohammedans. Of Jews the number is variously estimated at from 150,000 to 275,000. These Roumanian Hebrews, so far back as the records extend, have been subjected to oppressions that defy exaggeration—to brutal outrages that no tongue or pen can describe, and to ceaseless humiliations that must remain forever a burning disgrace upon the christian religion as practiced by the Greek church of Roumania.

Those who are at all familar with the persecutions to which the Hebrews of Roumania have been subjected will not be surprised to learn that a German steamship company has contracted to bring 3,000 of them to the United States. The movement is one of great significance which will not fail to awaken attention throughout christendom. We are informed that these Roumanian Jews upon their arrival in this country will come west, purchase lands, and engage in agricultural, which will be a new departure in the employments of the race—as trade, commerce and banking, with rare exceptions, are the chosen field for Hebrew operations. That so great a number have concluded to leave one European state for homes in the United States, shows that a grand exodus of Israelites may be regarded as certain, particularly from such European countries as continue to practice inhuman outrages upon the race. Western Russia, Prussia, Poland and the Danubian principalities contain a large population of Hebrews, and if these people, who once made the barren mountains of Judea fruitful, shall again turn their attention to agriculture, the United States will be to them another land of promise, and we shall hear of them coming in a steady stream, until European countries, ruled by bigots and practicing the most revolting cruelties upon defenceless men and women, will learn that brutal intolerance is condemned by the best thought of all civilized men. It is well said by a contemporary, in commenting upon the announcement that 3,000 Hebrews have left Roumania for the United States, that "America will offer immigrants a cordial welcome, marveling only that they did not come before. No race which has given its strength and energy to build up this republic contributes better citizens to our common country than the Hebrew. Sons of this ancient stock sit in our congress, and exert a potential influence in our exchanges and great commercial enterprises. The overwhelming majority of American Israelites are among our most orderly, well-disposed and loyal citizens. Hundreds of years ago it was said that the Jews were natural democrats, and their history in this country certainly demonstrates their devotion to free institutions and their intelligent comprehension of the duties of citizenship. If the Roumanian experiment shall lead to fulfillment of that darling dream of the New York Israelites—a great colony of their oppressed European brethren in the far west—the whole country will have good cause to be satisfied."—Indianapolis Sentinel.

A Sensation in Church.

[Milwaukee Sun]

There was the queerest scene at one of the churches last Sunday. It seems that during the vacation the seats had been newly varnished, and somehow the varnish was not right, as it was terribly sticky. You know when you pull anything off of sticky varnish that it cracks. Well, the audience had all got seated, when the minister got up to give out the hymn, and as the basement of his trousers let loose of the varnish of his chair there was a noise like killing a fly on the wall with a palm-leaf fan. The minister looked around at the chair to see if he was all present, and that no guilty man's pants had escaped, and read the hymn. The choir rose with a sound of revelry, and after the tenor had swallowed a lozenge and the bass had coughed up a piece of frog and the alto had hemmed and the soprano had shook out her polonaise to see if the varnish showed on the south side, the audience began to rise. One or two of the deacons got up first, with sounds like picket firing in the distance on the eve of battle, and then a few more got up, and the rattling of the unyielding varnish sounded as though the fight was becoming more animated, and then the whole audience got on its feet at once with a sound of rattling musketry. The choir sang "Hold the Fort" When the orchestra had concluded the people sat down gingerly, the services were short, and all went home praying for the man that painted the seats.

How Animals Play and Enjoy Themselves.

[The Passions of Animals.]

Small birds chase each other about in play; but, perhaps, the conduct of the crane and the trumpeter is most extraordinary. The latter stands on one leg and hops about in the most eccentric manner, and throws somersaults. Water-birds, such as ducks and geese, dive after each other and clear the surface of the water with outstretched neck and flapping wings, throwing abundant spray around. Deer often engage in sham battle, or trial of strength, by twisting their horns together and pushing for the mastery. All animals pretending violence in their play stop short of exercising it; the dog takes the greatest precaution not to injure by his bite, and the ourang outang, in wrestling with his keeper, pretends to throw him, and makes feints of biting him. Some animals carry out in their play the semblance of catching their prey. Young cats, for instance, leap after every small and moving object, even to the leaves strewed by the autumn wind They crouch and steel forward, ready for the spring, the body quivering and the tail vibrating with emotion, they bound on the moving leaf, and again spring forward to another. Benger saw young jaguars and cougars playing with round substances, like kittens. Birds of the magpie kind are the analogues of monkeys, full of mischief, play, and mimicry. There is a story of a tame magpie that was seen busily employed in a garden gathering pebbles, and with much solemnity and a studied air burying them in a hole made to receive a post. After dropping each stone it cried "Chr-ack," triumphantly, and set off for another. On examining the spot a poor toad was found in the hole, which the magpie was stoning for his amusement.

Good-Bye Sectionalism.

[Boston Globe.]

The "southern question" assumes an entirely different phase in consequence of the election of General Garfield from that which it would have assumed if General Hancock had been the successful candidate. Had General Hancock been elected, the southern question would have been settled, for the country would have been thoroughly convinced, by actual observation, that the southern leaders are not the disloyal, dangerous people which the republicans have represented them to be, but patriotic, law-abiding citizens, without any evil designs either upon the autonomy of the government of the United States treasury, and with both the intention and ability to govern wisely in the interest of the whole people. Under a democratic administration a political break up in the south would have been certain, and at the end of four years there would be no question but that law and order were established throughout that whole section.

The election of General Garfield puts the "southern question" back among the unsettled political problems of the day. If the Grant element, which will unquestionably dictate the policy of the Garfield administration, so far as the patronage is concerned, shall also control its southern policy, and attempt to restore the bayonet methods of the Grant administration, the south will be forced to remain solidly democratic in its own defence. It is barely possible that the republican party will attempt to keep the south solid in order to keep alive the feeling of sectional hostility for use in the next campaign. In our judgment, however, this will not be done.

There are several good reasons for this opinion. Time is a more potent agent than any political power, and self-interest is the most powerful of all motives. Before 1884 time will have made it impossible to excite sectional animosity at the north against the south, and self-interest will have induced the south to give up its solidity. So far as the Grantites are concerned, Grant himself realized before the end of his second administration that his southern policy was a failure, and he will not be likely to urge its readoption. So far as the republican party leaders are concerned, they learned, during the recent campaign, that the "solid south" has lost its force as a campaign cry, and they will hardly be foolish enough to believe that it may be made a leading issue after four years more. As for General Garfield himself, and his policy on this subject, we have no doubt whatever, that he will use his best efforts and all the means at his disposal, to break up the "solid south," and, for ourselves, are entirely confident that important interchanges of opinion upon this subject have already been had between General Garfield and prominent southern democratic leaders.

Be Kind to Your Wife.

Be kind to your wife. Think how, in the first blush of maiden beauty, she turned aside from the hands of pleasure and the cares of fond parents and brothers and sisters to follow your fortunes through the world. Think with what blended hope and agony you have followed her from place to place, watching her every look, and pondering the meaning of her most careless tones, until won by your importunity, she placed her hand all trustfully in yours and said, "I am all your own." Think of the cares and anxieties, and physical suffering she has secured for you, and do not desert her now, when her cheek is faded, her step has lost its elasticity, and she sits an uncomplaining watcher over your best interests, a self-incarcerated prisoner in her own home.

Merrily the music sounds, young feet trip lightly in the mazy dance, and joyous laughter rings along the walls—but she is not there; the curtain rises, and the far-famed artist comes forth to charm the listning crowd with her melodious song, but she is not there. The orator rises before his wrapt audience, his rich, deep tones of eloquence floating away along the crowded passages and curling upward as voiced incense to the vaulted roof, but she is not there. Art opens her new stores and displays her wonderful creations on the glowing canvass and in the speaking bust; your wife is a lover of the chaste and beautiful, but she is not there. Literature presents new leaves, fresh from the fascinating pen of genius—the wife the mother has but little time to read.

No, there she lingers at home, a God commissioned watcher over helpless children. Singing the babe to sleep, bending to catch the lisping voice of those dear ones who have a thousand imaginary wants, encouraging the quiet and soothing the fretful. She is weary, but does not complain, her temples throb, but she does not heed their throbbing, as ever and anon she turns a wistful glance towards the door, for she expects her husband.

Will you enter that room with cold indifference? Will you utter a hasty word in her presence? Will you sit down with that frown upon your countenance, or complain of the burdens you are called to bear? Will you thoughtlessly remind her of her faded beauty, or manifest surprise at her ignorance of many things now passing in the great world, from which she has been excluded by her peculiar duties? Will you suffer any more youthful and beautiful to haunt in home's hallowed precincts, or cross the white leaf of conjugal felicity with one unhallowed thought?—Oh! remember your early love, your early promises. Think how faithfully she has kept hers. Love her as you ought, and she is still beautiful—beautiful in her pure, motherly affections, her self-sacrificing devotion to you—realize that she is all your own; that throughout the wide world you are sure of but one heart whose every chord is linked invisibly to a counterpart in yours. Realize that upon her bosom alone you can weep out your sorrows in the day of trial, without the fear of being mocked.

Husband, love your wife! Gather her to your heart of hearts, as if in her was all your hopes of happiness combined. Bless her daily for her patience and truth. Stand up like a man between her and the rude, cold world and teach your children to love her, that God may honor you. In all the relations of life there comes a parting hour, and we beseech you to live so, that if it should ever be your lot to kiss her clay cold lips, and lay her in the grave forever, you may lay your hand upon your widowed heart and say: "I have never wronged you."

Anywhere but in New Jersey.

A young man, whose mind was wandering, was placed by his friends in the care of Dr.——, of the town of——, in the state of New Jersey, in the hope that he might, under his judicious treatment, soon be restored to health. He was, however, very discontented with the place, and with the restraint on his movements that was felt to be needful; and the doctor, more than once, in kind and friendly conversation, endevored to make him feel reconciled to his situation. And as the young man was of a religious turn of mind, and a constant reader of the bible, the doctor one day, when talking with him, said: "You ought to remember, my friend, that the apostle has taught us that in whatsoever state we are, we should therewith be content."

"Yes, yes," replied the other, "I know Paul says that, but then I don't think Paul was ever in the state of New Jersey."—EDITOR'S DRAWER, in Harper's Magazine for December.

A Flame that Illumines Without Being Incendiary.

The German papers state that a new light has been discovered by M. Kordig of the polytechnic association of St. Petersburg. The substance is composed of naptha, by a secret process, and is perfumed. The new light is said to have the remarkable property of being perfectly safe, and the experiments which were made by the inventor before a large company were really astounding. Mr. Kordig besmeared his coat with the preparation, and, setting fire to it, walked like a pillar of fire through the room without the slightest injury to himself or damage to his garment. Several members of the association repeated the experiment with a like result. The substance is reported to be equally safe in casks when a certain quantity of air is allowed. The Voss Zeitung states that it is burned in lamps of very simple construction; the bottom is lined with a porous substance. The lamp can be held in any position and the light will not be extinguished by the wind. The light itself is very pure and white. What will the kerosene demon do, if all this is true?

Caring for the Feet.

There are no parts of the human body that need more attention than the feet. They may be neglected or even abused without any bad consequences being immediately felt; they will to a certainly be eventually felt, and felt very sorely, too. An excessive flow of blood to the head, extreme liability to cold, disordered digestion and other numerous evils are the results of inattention to the feet. The feet should be regularly washed and wiped every day. Stockings should not be put on while there is the slightest moisture in the feet. The stockings absorb the moisture, return it to the feet slowly, thereby causing them to feel cold and uncomfortable, and what is worse, when the feet are cold, circulation is interfered with, and the whole system, especially the brain, is thrown into an abnormal state. Keep the feet clean and warm, the head cool, and the bowels open. If you wish to preserve your whole system in good working order, be sure and preserve your feet. Let all our readers profit by these remarks, and they will soon feel, by experience, that we are not aggravating the consequences of proper attention to the feet.

Senator Bayard at Home.

In his family Senator Bayard is the model husband and the model father, His wife and children are his jewels, and he cherishes them with a true father's love and care. His family are his companions, and when he is not engaged in his public duties at the capitol you are almost sure to find him with his family at home. The Bayards live very unpretensionsly at Washington, in a plain brick mansion, large and roomy. The house is furnished with a view to the comfort of the inmates rather than as an exhibition of the wealth of its owner, and therein it differs from the homes of most wealthy men in Washington. The engravings and paintings upon the walls are rare rather than numerous; the furniture is comfortable and artistic rather than fashionable and showy.

Depending on Circumstances.

"Guilty or not guilty?" asked a Galveston justice of the peace of a colored, culprit who was accused of stealing a whole line full of linen.

"Dat 'ar 'pends on circumstances. Ef you is gwine to lemme off wid a repriman', like las' time, den I owns up to six shirts, foah pilly-slips, and about a dozzen udder pieces, but if you is gwine to sock it ter me, den, sah, I calls for a jury to windicate myself, so I can sue for $40,000 damages."

"I'll enter the plea of not guilty."

"I say, boss, if you will lemmy off wid de repriman' I'll plead guilty to dis fust offense, and five chickens I pulled las' week, and a wood-pile I'se gwine to inspect ter-night."

The Old Lady Gave it Away.

A very singular book has just been published in Germany. It purports to be written by a lady to whom old King Leopold, of Belgium, was married secretly about 1827, on the condition that, if he were called to a throne, the marriage should be considered null and void. To this the lady consented; but she now not only discloses the fact, but gives a detailed account of the transaction, and of her married life with Leopold.

Examination Of Teachers.

Examinations for the year commencing June 1st, 1879, will be held regularly, in the high-school building at Auburn, the last Saturday of each month. Special examinations at other points on due notice.

MODERN FIDELITY.

BY W. P. WASSON.

From the stormy coast of her native land
She gazed far o'er the blue,
Where the waves dashed up in splendor grand;
Her garments on the cold sea sand
Were damp with ocean's dew.

She loved to come at the close of day
And hear the billows' roar,
And watch the foaming, seething spray
Where her sailor love had sailed away
To India's distant shore.

And now a memory surged her mind;
One standing, fair and tall,
Where erst the flowery jessamine
Had draped in happy days langsyne
A cottage garden wall.

They stood when day was but begun
Beside the wall of stone;
But when the west—the dipping sun—
Betokened that the day was done
She rested there alone.

She wondered if he thought to-night
Of loving friends at home;
Did he keep the curl so brown and bright
That he severed from its mates the night
He left that cottage home.

The chill winds swept the rocky height—
She lingered by the sea
And watched till the somber wings of night
Had borne away the fading light
On the waves of eternity.

* * * * *

On India's distant shore was he,
Not fondling her auburn curl,
Nor thinking of loved ones over the sea,
But kissing beneath a banyan tree
A cross-eyed Hindoo girl.

* * * * *

She wearily waited and sadly prayed
For a glimpse of his azure blouse,
Till she heard; and rather than be a maid,
She married a peddler of decent grade,
And went to keeping house.

'Twas a little cottage she had to keep;
It stood beside the main;
And oft she watched the troubled deep,
When night winds cradled the waves asleep,
And thought of her love again.

"It might have been," she murmured low,
Tear mists her blue eyes dim;
And the sea birds sweeping to and fro,
The fitful shadows that come and go,
Too oft remind of him.

'Tis ever thus. Friends change apart;
Stern absence gives a weary pain,
And gossip wings the fatal dart,
To rend the sinking, hopeless heart
Of one who waits in vain.

And love's a sacred thing that few,
Ah, very few may share!
And lovers to-day are not so true
As romance pictures them out to you,
Oh, maiden with golden hair!

And your Jimmy or Sammy, John or Carl,
So noble, kind and true,
Keeps one wistful eye upon the girl
With golden pate or brighter curl,
The while they cherish you.

But let not this dishearten you;
Accept the trust that's given;
For love that's truly pure and true
Can never, never be for you
This side the ports of heaven.

CARLETON COUNTY, N. B.

THE COCKLEBURR CLUB.

A New and Thrilling Story.

Since the time that the estimable gentleman had consented to act as Treasurer of our organization got embarrassed and irregulated with the funds thereunto belonging we have had no regular meeting place. Because, since the Sheriff so ruthlessly fired us out into the street for non-payment of rent, we have been unable until very recently to find any one soft enough to give us a resting-place without our planking up the rent in advance. But patience and perseverance will accomplish wonders in the financial as well as the animal world; so we've again achieved a local habitation and a name. And we're not going to give it away, either, for you to go and post our landlord, perhaps.

As all this scuffling round has brought us to the verge of financial collapse, it was resolved unanimously, at last meeting, that something should be done to restore the late statu quo of our treasury. It was, to curtail an elongated narrative, suggested that your servant try to find a buyer for his soul-thrilling memoirs, entitled "Confessions of a Reformed Paragrapher," and donate or lend the proceeds thereof to the club to achieve its rehabilitation. Thereupon the underwriter proceeded to read the manuscript for the edification of those who hadn't had the pleasure of perusing it, but before the second chapter was reached I found that at least half a dozen Cockleburrs imagined that they were hit between wind and water, as it were, and that the whole thing was only a malignant, insidious exposure of their little mental corns. By assuring them that I did not refer to them order was restored, but before the fifth chapter was reached the President, Col. Bungstarter, jumped to his feet and roared at me: "Why do you dare, sir, drag my family skeletons to the light of day?"

I replied that I never dragged a skeleton anywhere in my life.

"What do you mean, then, sir, by your impertinent reference to 'Old Doozlebung?'"

"Why," I replied, "Colonel, that's a purely imaginary character; I didn't think there was a Doozlebung in the wide world."

"Didn't know Helena, Arkansaw! I let you know now, then, that my wife's sister married a Doozlebung, and I don't intend to sit quietly by and hear family troubles exposed; no, not even to save the Cockleburr Club from the dengue."

Further reading of the confession had to cease, for it was evident that there wasn't a man in the room but was certain that portions of the manuscript referred directly to him.

Verily, the way of the paragrapher is hard. As it was unanimously resolved that the private peccadilloes and failings of the members of the club should not be used as a fulcrum to boost the financial condition thereof, we had to cast about for some other means to accelerate the velocity of the air currents. Whereupon the undersigned, piqued at the unceremonious manner in which his cherished literary effort had been sat down on, suggested that some one else try his hand at the bellows for a wind-raiser. After considerable discussion it was decided that, whereas, it would take too long to write a novel, or anything else, single-handed; and, whereas, that all were equally implicated in the affair; and, whereas, that we possessed abundant raw material—of the rawest kind, too—for the venture; and, whereas, that time and landlords wait for no man, it was unanimously

Resolved, That the members of this club each write one chapter, to the best of his ability, and according to his own style and his conception of the exigencies of the case.

Considerable ill-feeling was manifested as to who should name the title or block out the plot, and after much wrangling it was decided that Col. Bungstarter should name the offspring as well as write the opening chapter. Plot, there was to be none, each chapter to be so beautifully rounded off that absence of plot would not be noticed.

The Secretary was directed to write just what was dictated to him, as in order to accelerate things the whole thing was to go right along viva voce, beginning at the President and going on down to the underwriter, who was to give all the brides away (and he never gave a girl away in his life), hang all the villains and dispose of all the characters, either by mysterious disappearance or otherwise.

After clearing his throat, Col. Bungstarter began:

THE CROOKED REPORTER!

OR,

THE BEER-JERKER'S REVENGE!

A TALE OF THE SERIOUS NEVADA.

It was a dark and stormy night in the Serious Nevada. By the flashes of lightning that almost blinded our hero, a solitary horseman might be seen wending his way amid the peals of thunder that lined the road through the gloomy, Indian-haunted canyon. By getting in front of him we can see by the flashes of lightning that he is young, and also that in his side-pocket glistens something it won't do to fool with too much. Ever and anon, as some horned owl hoots mournfully over his head far up the canyon, he grasps this shining thing, exclaiming:

"Ha!"

Mr. Sickembull next!

CHAPTER II.

We draw nearer to our hero, and by the electric light read the legend inscribed upon the shining thing that he holds in a horizontal position to his face; it is hop bitters—here a dozen members jumped to their feet, protesting against any advertisements being rung in on this novel without seeing the proprietors first. Carried.

Far above the roaring of the Alpine storm our hero hears what appears to be the voice of a female in distress. Plunging the spurs into his noble steed, he plunges madly down the mountain side, when, suddenly—

Maj. Jones, next!

CHAPTER III.

When suddenly the scene changed. Four young men are seated around a table, in a Southern California town, whose features bear the stamp of intellect. They were playing poker. The reckless manner in which they won and lost thousands proclaimed their calling. They were newspaper men.

Grasping a handful of gold from the table, the youngest, tossing it toward an auburn-haired maiden hard by, murmured, "Three beers and a straight." As the elder dealt out three cards round, the younger began to sing in a low, plaintive voice:

This is the pair I long have sought,
And mourned bekase I drew it not.

The elder seemed to tumble to his lay, for he refused to straddle the blind and stayed out, but the man with the long hair doubled his ante, and made it steep to come in; but the young one saw him, and was on the point of raising him out of his boots, when—

Capt. Smith!

CHAPTER IV.

When the cries grew louder and louder, until our hero, coming suddenly to the foot of the canyon, beheld a female form perched upon a rock in the middle of a roaring river.

Heedless of danger, he plunged his horse into the seething waters, and, as he grasped her around her slender waist, the horse broke away, and left him alone upon the rock with the maiden. The waters, with exultant gurgles, rose and rose until it was chin-deep around there, when suddenly—

Mr. Snodgrass next!

CHAPTER V.

When suddenly they both rolled over and was drowned, and—

Here the club was in a general uproar of protest against the willful murder of the hero right at the start.

Snodgrass was ruled out.

Mr. Simpson next!

CHAPTER VI.

When suddenly the old man said, "I see your twenty and raise you five."

"I call you. What have you got?"

"Two pair."

"No good," said the old man, gathering in the pot, until he saw that it was two pair of aces the young one had accumulated. There would be nothing strange in that, but the old man had three aces himself, and had begun to manifest a desire to go behind the returns, when a loud crash was heard, and with a shriek the fair maid with the auburn hair entered, crying, "Fire!"

CHAPTER VII.

The scene changes. Pacing up and down in the cell of the prison might be seen a man about forty years of age, more or less. Fifteen years have elapsed since the stormy night we left him perched on a rock in the middle of a mountain torrent.

"Will she never come?" he murmurs, as he glances toward the door.

She enters; with a sob she throws herself on the prisoner's shoulder.

"It's no use, Philander," she cries; "they'll bring in a verdict of murder. The jury's bin playin' poker all night to get the hang of the evidence, and some infernal moke run in a cold hand o' fours on the foreman, an' he is in fur hangin' ye now."

CHAPTER VIII.

The gallows are finished.

The prisoner is playing a last game of seven-up with the Sheriff, when suddenly—

Mr. Green next!

CHAPTER IX.

A tremendous roaring noise is heard and an earthquake strikes the place, tearing the jail asunder, and the prisoner (who, the reader knows, is our hero) and the maiden fly to the railroad in time to—

Mr. Peters next!

CHAPTER X.

In time to get run over by the 9:15 express. A simple cross marks their last resting place—United in life, united in death.

This novel may be a little jerky, but it has enough raw material in it for a dozen ordinary yarns. And, if it is jerky, you must remember that no two writers view things from the same standpoint. To the hands of our countrymen we commit ourselves. Officially,

U. H.

"Where are you from?" asked the Judge, as the complainant stood up.

"Why, Jedge, I'm right from Custer City in the Black Hills. They call me Whoopin' Antelope, 'cause I'm the terror of all that region."

"And yet you say this man, half your size, thumped you till your face looks like a load of coal?"

"That's the way I mix it, Jedge," responded the Whoopin' Antelope. "Just as soon as he hit me I drawed back fer room, and there was a brick lodge right in the way. Backed right up against it. I went to let go with this yer left fist, what's scattered more'n a ton of brains at different times, and, dog my cats, there was a street-car right in front of me. Didn't have the room, Jedge. If I'd had the room I'd been helpin' the Coroner view the corpse now."

"How much room do you want?" asked the Judge.

"I want a whole prairie, Jedge. When I draw back like this, see! I need space. Then I lunge, so. Look! Then I fetches like this, and where'd the man be if I had room? I was afraid of breaking some man's real estate with him. Didn't dare turn loose. That's where he fetched me. Send him out to Dakota with me. That's all I want. Make him come where there's distance to move around in. Give me a fair show with him, but don't confine me where there ain't room. S'pose I'd smash a house with him! S'pose I'd jest slung him around like I ought to! Who'd paid for the holocaust? Who'd been a father to the orphans I'd have manufactured? Who'd have married the widows of those who fell around like chips? That's the reason I let up, Jedge. I'd rather be smashed than a murderer of the innocents. That's where he took advantage of me. Fine him, Jedge. Lock him up for a term of years, or I may forget myself if I find him loose."

"I think I'll let him go," replied the Judge.

"Then let me go first. Keep him here twenty minutes. Let me get where I can't see him when he comes out, or I won't be responsible for the earthquake. I won't be liable for obliterating the town. If you're a patriot, Jedge, you'd better hold him back for half an hour."

"You won't touch him," said the Judge to the defendant.

"Don't trust him, Jedge," interrupted the complainant. "If you're goin' to let him go, I'll stay here. Lock me in a cell. Handcuff me. Bind me with shackles, but don't let me get at him. My bile is risin', Jedge, I ain't safe."

"I believe I will give you ten days," mused the Judge.

"Make it a month, Jedge. Make it long enough to cool me off, and make him leave town. There ain't room for us both. Make him get out, Jedge, if you want to save life."

And he gathered himself into a small bundle and crept around his antagonist and made a bound for the Black Maria.

"I don't mind going to jail," he observed to a fellow-traveler, "but I hate to spill blood," and, as the fellow-traveler handed him one on the bridge of the nose, he fell under the seat and shook with suppressed passion. — Brooklyn Eagle.

The Horrors of Russian Criminal Law.

As to the manner in which Nihilists are treated in prison the following case may serve as an example:

L. H. was arrested for a small press offence in November. He was placed in a cell so small that it was almost impossible to stand upright in it, while walking was out of the question. The window was broken, and the stoveless dungeon soon filled with snow and ice. L. H., who had only his trousers and shirt on when imprisoned, was left without any additional clothing, without being even for one moment removed from this cell for five months. The only covering given him was a thin blanket, thrown in at night and taken away in the morning. The fact that torture is applied in Russian jails is so well known that the relatives and friends of prisoners continually try to convey them poison in order that these unhappy victims may escape the terrible sufferings they are subjected to. The mother of H—— herself supplied her son with prussic acid "in case he should be questioned." In the case of Solovieff, one Trapp publicly boasted "he would soon make the prisoner speak in all tongues," a boast which he would undoubtly have tried to execute but for the threats of the Nihilist Committee, who so effectively intimidated the prison authorities that Solovieff was "only hanged."

"We willingly risk our lives," a Russian exile said to me lately, "we die gladly in our cause; the only thing we do fear is the torture. Most of us carry poison; but this is now so well known that doctors are always in attendance to administer antidotes at the first sign of poison having been taken."

The Battle.

A General, sitting in front of a hotel in time of war, heard a newsboy crying his papers, "All about the battle." The General bought a paper, but could not find the account of the engagement. Turning to the newsboy, he said, "I do not see any battle." "No," said the boy; "you never will if you sit here!"

WONDERS OF THE OCEAN.

[From the New York Sun.]

In the opinion of Professor A. E. Verrill, of Yale College, the recent deep sea dredging expedition off the coast of Rhode Island, on the edge of the Gulf Stream, under the auspices of the United States Fish Commission, proved the most successful ever sent out by this or any other country. In three days more specimens were obtained than by any other expedition in as many months. Indeed, the English expedition on the Challenger, which was at work deep sea dredging for five years continuously, did not accomplish more or get a larger collection.

The dredging was done from seventy-five to one hundred and fifteen miles south of Newport in the region known as Black Island Soundings, the depth of water being from one quarter to three quarters of a mile. The specially constructed steamer Fish Hawk, fitted up with the most approved scientific appliances, was used, and the expedition was under the direct charge of Professor Baird of Washington. The ground was especially favorable. A peculiar beam trawl was used for scraping the bottom of the ocean. It was a net forty or fifty feet long. The mouth of it was spread open by an oak beam fifteen feet long and six inches in diameter. The beam rested upon heavy iron runners, to keep the network bag about two feet off the bottom. The lower side of the mouth of the net was formed of a receding rope, weighted with lead. This rope dragged along the bottom, and scraped the shellfish, shells, and whatnot, into the net. Fish swimming at that depth were also scooped in, and once inside they were entangled in pockets that prevented their escaping. The trawl would be thrown out and drawn along behind the steamer, making a swath half a mile long and twelve or fifteen feet wide. Then a powerful hoisting engine would be set to work and the trawl and its contents hoisted aboard the steamer. As many as 4,000 pounds weight of stuff would be taken from the bottom of the ocean each time the trawl was hoisted. Two barrels of alcohol a day were used in preparing rare specimens. To put them in shape will be the work of weeks. To thoroughly arrange and classify the thousands of specimens obtained will occupy the Commission all winter. Most of this work will be done here by Professor Verrill and his assistants.

Eighteen species of fish were caught heretofore unknown and undescribed, besides others known to Greenland and Northern Europe, but not to our coast; also a wonderful variety of crabs, shrimp, and lobster-like creatures, some of them very handsome, and forty species of them entirely new. One hundred and fifty-five different kind of shells, one hundred and fifteen of them not before known on this part of the coast, fifty-five not known as inhabitants of American waters, and thirty wholly unknown to scientists heretofore, were obtained. In addition, two new kinds of devilfish, one about a foot long; two hundred specimens of a new and pretty squid, and twenty new kinds of starfish were taken. Of these starfish, thousands of specimens were netted, some of exceeding beauty. Quite a number of new species of corals were caught, some of them being brought up by the bushel. Of fan coral some beautiful specimens were obtained. Hundreds of sea anemones, brilliantly colored, some of them measuring a foot across, delighted the eyes of the men of science. One strange discovery was a worm inhabiting a quill like a goose quill. The quills were about a foot long, and soon after being taken out of the water grew so hard that they could be and were used for pens. They stood up in the mud at the bottom of the sea. The worms inside were opal colored, and when taken out of their strange tenements glistened and presented a rather pretty appearance, so far as color was concerned. They were raked up by thousands, and none of the scientific men ever heard of them before.

The records of the temperature at different depths were always made with great care. At a depth of from 100 to 142½ fathoms the temperature was usually from 51 deg. to 53 deg., Fahrenheit. From 142½ to 325 fathoms it was from 42 deg. to 43 deg., and at 500 fathoms it was 40 deg. The pressure at 500 fathoms or over was very great, sufficient to crush and press together the wood that encased the thermometer until it was a shapeless mass, and so to press the rope used to lower the instrument that it came up hardened and squeezed together until it resembled a shapeless bar of metal.

Tough Hoofs of Horses.

It is stated that the Arabian horses, so largely used as cavalry in the British army in India, possess such tough hoofs that they rarely require shoeing. In a full-grown horse the hoof becomes as hard as flint, and he can make the most severe marches without injury to his feet.

In ancient times, historians inform us, all horses went unshod, and to be able to do so particular attention had to be given to breed from none except those having the toughest of hoofs. Mr. Story, the American sculptor at Rome, in one of his publications speaks of the Italian horses still retaining this extra toughness of hoof, derived, doubtless, from the old Roman breed.

Brittle and tender feet in horses, it is contended, come from the following neglect in breeding: First, hereditary predisposition; second, imperfect nutrition; third, alternations of moisture and dryness; fourth, disease of the foot; fifth, faulty shoeing. Horse breeders would do well to consider all these points attentively, and beware not only of them but all other defects of body and limb, external and internal.—Rural New Yorker.

Swing on Theaters.

Prof. Swing, in the Chicago Alliance, thus appeals to theatrical people: "It seems desirable that all our much-admired actors and actresses should respect the religious opinions and feelings of many of their best friends and decline to produce their plays on that day sacred to religion. If the men and women of the church are the friends now of the drama, cannot the great actors help the Christian world to keep one night of the week sacred to the Almighty?" Referring to the stage generally, Prof. Swing says: "Without pausing to seek a philosophy for a new era in this shape of art, let us simply confess that the profession of the actor can now point with pride to a large group of men worthy of their art and of a generous public esteem."

THE STAGE.

How to turn people's heads—come to a concert late in a pair of squeaking boots.

CARLOTTA PATTI and M. De Munck (her husband) are feted everywhere in Australia.

MISS FLORENCE MARRYATT is giving public readings in England, and talks of coming hither for the same purpose.

A VOLUME of reminiscences of the late Ole Bull is to be made of materials which the violinist left with his family.

PROF. NORTON, of Harvard College, on account of ill health, has been obliged to give up his lectures on fine arts this year.

FREDERICK SWAB has received $1,500 from Sarony for the exclusive privilege of photographing Bernhardt in America.

LUCY H. HOOPER writes from Paris that virtue on the French stage means alpaca gowns, a cab to drive in, and onion soup in a garret.

FOR his comedy of Black-eyed Susan, which still holds the stage, Douglass Jerrold received just what Milton did for Paradise Lost—twenty-five dollars.

NEW HAVEN, Ct., is proud of its opera-houses. It has only about 60,000 inhabitants, yet it has three opera-houses. Unfortunately, only one of them is a "grand" opera-house.

MR. ABBEY is a Napoleon among the theatrical managers. He is bold and enterprising. He has arranged to bring out the Passion Play.—New York Commercial Advertiser.

CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG is in Europe, and one of the toughest problems in the European mind to fathom is why she will persist in ordering forty barrels of American onions every month.

RINGS are not to be worn on the first finger of either hand, says the latest authority, but you can not convince the young woman who takes off her gloves at the theater that two of her fingers were given to her for nothing.

IT is said that Anna Dickinson will try by litigation to prevent Fanny Davenport from acting her play, An American Girl, in any other form than that in which it was written. Bartley Campbell threatens similar proceedings against Frank Mayo with reference to Van, the Virginian.

THE stone which covers the grave of Miss Neilson in Brompton Cemetery, says the Echo, has already been surrounded by flowering plants and covered with wreaths and immortelles, placed there by the hands of loving and affectionate admirers. At the head, pending the completion of a suitable monument, stands a simple white cross, bearing only the word "Neilson."

MODJESKA has been sued in London for $30,000, on account of her refusal to come to America this season. She was under contract to a manager for five years. After performing in this country three years he failed to provide her with engagements for the fourth, and she made a London venture on her account, meeting with great success there. She claims that the contract was broken by the manager, and he seeks to hold her to it.

THE German Crown Prince has been the most popular of all the visitors at The Passion Play in Oberammergau. He stayed out the entire play, and afterward told the Burgomaster that he should never forget the performance, for the impression made upon him was greater than he could express. It is already a tradition among the Oberammergau peasantry that tears stood in the eyes of "Unser Fritz" when he said those words and grasped the Burgomaster's hand.

THERE is now only one theater in the country, the Boston Museum, where the old system of weekly changes of bill by a stock company is maintained. All the rest, except the few which run plays for long periods, are given up to traveling parties. Actors never before earned their pay so easily. With only half a dozen, or fewer, parts to study for an entire season, and no rehearsals after each new play is fairly started, the labor is almost confined to the time actually spent in the public performances.

IT is authoritatively announced that the fickle Patti has resolved upon selling her Brecon seat, Craig-y-nos Castle, upon which she has latterly spent a great fortune. The reason for the proposed sale is that Mme. Patti has been surprised at the high assessment placed upon the castle, and that she has been displeased by depredations made on her estate. The water works which she erected at considerable expense have been destroyed, the river and land are poached upon for fish and game, and the poachers have had the audacity to come to the door of the castle to offer their spoil for sale, and the keepers employed have been frequently molested.

An Eye Fountain.

The eyesight of the Czar is said to have greatly improved by a simple remedy, consisting of a glaznoi douche, or eye fountain, throwing a tiny jet of delicate spray a yard and a half into the air. The temperature of the water is fixed at 80 degrees Fahrenheit, and the spray is allowed to beat against the eyelids for ninety seconds, night and morning. The remedy seems at first sight ridiculously simple, but it has for several years been successfully employed in Russia. For the literary man or jaded beauty, going with weak and weary eyes to rest, there is said to be nothing more refreshing than to bend for a minute or two over a glaznoi douche. The eyes recover strength in an amazing manner from the fine but powerful impact of the invigorating spray, and there is none of that depressive reaction succeeding the use of tonics.

VEGETINE.

Kidney Complaints.

DISEASE OF THE KIDNEYS.

The symptoms of an acute attack of inflammation of the kidneys are as follows: Fever, pain in the small of the back, and thence shooting downward; numbness of the thigh, vomiting, usually at first a deep red color of the urine, which becomes pale and colorless as the disease increases, and is discharged very often with pain and difficulty; costiveness and some degree of colic. In chronic diseases of the kidneys the symptoms are pain in the back and limbs, dryness of the skin, frequent urination (especially at night), general dropsy, headache, dizziness of sight, indigestion and palpitation of the heart, gradual loss of strength, paleness and puffiness of the face, cough, and shortness of breath.

In diseases of the kidneys the VEGETINE gives immediate relief. It has never failed to cure when it is taken regularly and directions followed. In many cases it may take several bottles, especially cases of long standing. It acts directly upon the secretions, cleansing and strengthening, removing all obstructions and impurities. A great many can testify to cases of long standing having been perfectly cured by the VEGETINE, even after trying many of the known remedies which are said to be expressly for this disease.

KIDNEY COMPLAINTS.

CINCINNATI, O., March 19, 1877.

H. R. STEVENS:

Dear Sir—I have used your VEGETINE for some time, and can truthfully say it has been a great benefit to me; and to those suffering from disease of the kidneys I cheerfully recommend it.

Respectfully, O. H. SMITH.

CINCINNATI, O., April 19, 1877.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:

I have suffered several years with the kidney complaint, and was induced to try VEGETINE. I have taken several bottles of your preparation, and am convinced it is a valuable remedy. It has done me more good than any other medicine. I can heartily recommend it to all suffering from kidney complaints.

Yours respectfully,

THE FAMILY PHYSICIAN.

SORE THROAT.—Gargle for sore throat: Tincture myrrh, two drachms; common water, two ounces; vinegar, half an ounce. Mix.

FOR BURNS OR SCALDS.—Varnish the wound with the white of an egg. The application of the egg is more soothing than sweet oil and cotton, the common remedy for burns.

TONIC APERIENT.—Epsom salts, one ounce; diluted sulphuric acid, one drachm; infusion of quassia chips, half an imperial pint; compound tincture of rhubarb, two drachms. Half a wine-glassful for a dose twice each day.

DIARRHEA.—It is said the small plant, commonly known by the name of rupturewort, made into tea and drunk frequently, is a sure cure for diarrhea. Rupturewort grows in nearly every open lot and along the roads. It is a small plant, throwing out a number of shoots in a horizontal direction, and lying close to the ground, something similar to the manner of the parsleyweed, and bears a small dark green leaf with an oblong purple spot in the center. When the stem is broken, a white milky substance will ooze from the wound. It is very palatable and infants take it as readily as any drink. This is an old Indian cure, and may be relied on. The botanical name of this plant is Euphorbia Maculata.

HOW TO KILL A TAPEWORM IN AN HOUR.—Kousso and kamala are expensive drugs, nauseous to the taste, not always effectual, and requiring several days to effect the death of the worm. Dr. Karl Bettelheim, of Vienna, narrates in the Deutsches Archiv, a heroic method and nearly sure cure in the short space of time of three-quarters of an hour to two hours. It is this: He inserts a tube in the œsophagus, to the stomach, and pours down from 200 to 400 grammes of a very concentrated decoction of pomegranate root, having previously had his patient fast for twenty-four hours. The worm is stupefied and passed, head and all, to a certainty; the patient has no sickness of the stomach and no nauseous swallowing to do, and the drug is cheap.

HOW TO CURE A COLD.—On the first day of taking cold there is a very unpleasant sensation of chilliness. The moment you observe this go to your room and stay there; keep it at such a temperature as will prevent this chilly feeling, even if it requires 100 degrees of Fahrenheit. In addition, put your feet in water, half-leg deep, as hot as you can bear it, adding hotter water from time to time for a quarter of an hour, so that the water shall be hotter when you take your feet out than when you put them in; then dry them thoroughly, and put on warm, thick woolen stockings, even if it be in summer, for summer colds are the most dangerous; and for twenty-four hours eat not an atom of food, but drink as largely as you like of any kind of warm teas, and at the end of that time, if not sooner, the cold will be effectually broken without any medicine whatever.

Something About Glass.

Some boy writes to "The Doctor," asking how window-glass is made so flat and smooth, "especially those in the large windows of store-fronts." There are two kinds of window-glass, one called "cylinder" and the other "plate" glass. All the large panes are plate-glass, as the size of cylinder-glass cannot be increased beyond a certain point. In this kind of glass a cylinder is blown. Those who have been in a glass-house—and I advise you, whenever you have an opportunity, to visit one and see how this wonderful material is worked—know that to make a cylinder a glass is first blown. This then is worked into a cylinder by rolling it upon an iron table. After a cylinder is made its ends are cut off, and it is divided lengthwise and flattened out to form a flat, smooth sheet. All plate-glass is cast. A polished iron table has ledges at the side as high as the thickness of the plate of glass. The metal glass is poured upon this and spread and flattened by a copper roller. The plate is then annealed; that is, put into a very hot furnace, which is so arranged that the glass will cool very slowly, in order that it shall be tough when, at the end of a week or so, it is cool. But the glass is now dull and rough, like that which you see in roofs and skylights. To become the beautiful plate-glass it must be ground and polished. The plates are so arranged that they may be rubbed together, one upon the other, by machinery. First sand and water are placed between them, then emery of different sizes, and after being ground with the finest emery they are polished by rubbing them with some kind of polishing powder.—American Agriculturist.

Humbugged Again.

I saw so much said about the merits of Hop Bitters, and my wife, who was always doctoring and never well, teased me so urgently to get her some, I concluded to be humbugged again; and I am glad I did, for in less than two months' use of the Bitters my wife was cured, and she has remained so for eighteen months since. I like such humbugging.—H. T., St. Paul.—Pioneer-Press.

Hydrophobia.

Hydrophobia seems to be generated from the saliva of other animal than dogs. Cat bite has produced it, though it is not in evidence whether the cat was spontaneously hydrophobic or was inoculated. The Duke of Brunswick died in Canada from hydrophobia from the bite of a pet fox. In all cases the bite which poisons thus seems necessarily to be that of a carnivorous animal. Possibly the larger carnivora may at times be similarly affected, and spontaneously, though we can hardly expect, from the few cases of human beings who survive the immediate effects of the bite, to find a case of hydrophobia thus recorded.

A Unique Jail and Jailer.

One of the most primitive and unique of prisons is to be found in the Swiss Canton of Schwytz. This prison, if the term can be applied to a house which possesses neither bars, locks, bolts, nor warders, is a tumble-down habitation popularly known as "The Maison de Sucre." Here thieves and murderers are incarcerated, the Governor of the jail being a nun! There is, it is true, a male director, who has under him a police officer, but neither the one nor the other deems it necessary to look after the prisoners of both sexes immured in this singular house of detention, the doors of which are left open, as though to facilitate the escape of the inmates. So agreeable, however, is the regime, so pleasant the life in the "Maison de Sucre," that it rarely happens that one cares to profit by the liberty which reigns there.

A World of Good.

One of the most popular medicines now before the American public is Hop Bitters. You see it everywhere. People take it with good effect. It builds them up. It is not as pleasant to the taste as some other Bitters as it is not a whisky drink. It is more like the old-fashioned boneset tea that has done a world of good. If you don't feel just right try Hop Bitters.—Phonda News.

Canoeing in the United States.

When John Macgregor, of the Inner Temple, published his entertaining account of the Rob Roy's thousand-mile voyage on the lakes and rivers of Europe, he established canoeing as a summer pastime.

The introduction of canoeing in the United States may be said to have taken place in 1870, when the New York Canoe Club was founded by William L. Alden. The Indian birch and dug-out, it is true, belong to the canoe group, but they are, at best, rude craft, unfit for general cruising, and had long before gone into disuse, and come to be valued only as relics of an uncivilized condition. Americans have enthusiastically adopted the pastime, and it is only a question of time when canoes will be as frequently seen on our bays, lakes, and rivers as sail and row boats. Besides our long coast-line, we have an immense system of inland water, a great part of which is as yet unexplored, and cannot for years be explored by any other craft than the light and easily portaged canoe. There is no one of the States in which long cruises may not be made.

It has been stated, upon authority, that summer cruises may be made upon the waters of Wisconsin alone for thirty years without retracing or exhausting the territory. In the northern portion of the State there are almost numberless unexplored lakes, some of large size, that are connected by rivers and smaller streams. A canoe may for instance be launched upon Pewaukee Lake, a beautiful sheet of water about twenty miles west of Milwaukee, and then follow a winding course through a delightful country, through lake to rivulet, and from rivulet to lake, the lakes varying in length from three to eight miles, and in width from one to four miles. Leaving the lakes, the canoe may follow Rock River, and passing many beautiful towns and villages, striking the Mississippi at Rock Island, Illinois. Many of the Western (notably Minnesota and Michigan), Eastern, and Middle States offer equally attractive field for summer cruising. Canada is as yet almost unmapped. Twenty-five miles to the northward of Quebec the exploring canoeist is beyond the bounds of civilization, and at the entrance to a region of picturesque lakes, that, with their connecting streams, form a chain almost unbroken, save by rapids and falls, to either the Hudson Bay country or the Saguenay, and the little-known territory still to the northward.

Long cruises have been made by Americans. The Kleine Fritz (A. H. Siegfried) has followed the course of the Mississippi from the extreme head-waters to Rock Island, Illinois; the Maria Theresa (N. H. Bishop) has cruised by inland waters from Lansingburg, New York, to the mouth of the Suwannee River; the Bubble (Charles E. Chase) in 1878 cruised from New York to Quebec by connecting waterways, thence by portage, through the valley of the Chaudière, to the head-waters of and down the Connecticut River, to and through Long Island Sound, to New York. Mr. C. H. Farnham has recently completed a Canadian voyage embracing the Saguenay, its tributaries, and other water-courses. In 1879 Mr. Frank Zibler made a cruise of about 1200 miles, from Racine, Wisconsin, to New Orleans. Many less extended cruises have been made, and clubs have been organized in the larger cities.—C. E. Chase in Harper's Magazine.

Health of the American Eagle.

[From the Cleveland Penny Press.]

To relieve the monotony of the constant important sayings of "Our Candidate," "Our Next President" and "Our Fellow Citizen," it is a pleasure for us to present herewith the opinion of one of Cleveland's most popular druggists, Mr. E. A. Schellentrager, 717 St. Clair street. The gentleman writes: I know of no remedy which has given more universal satisfaction than the Hamburg Drops. I have not heard of a case where they failed to benefit. The very large and daily growing demand for this Great German Blood Purifier is a source of high gratification, for, aside from the pecuniary gain, one takes pleasure in selling an article of such marked efficacy and superior merit.

Tiresome Sundays.

In order to appreciate fully the beauty of our Sundays one should live abroad two or three years. My dislike to foreign Sundays has reached a perfect pitch of bitterness, a foreign correspondent writes: Owing to an accident, I have not been able to go to church the last two or three weeks, and so I have had the full benefit of a Sunday in a foreign land. Let me give my experience for the benefit of such as think that our Sunday may be improved. As I lie here I hear the piano in a room close by played vigorously. The same runs, the same shakes, the same crashing chords, are being repeated over and over again that I have had to listen to every day during the past week. I can also hear the piano across the road being practiced on in the same way that I have heard it practiced on every day during the past week. In the long passage outside my door I can hear the servant scouring away as hard at drudging work as she was yesterday. I can hear the housewife with her jingling keys opening store-cupboards, and giving out stores in the same dreary round of duties that have occupied her all the week, and when I am carried into the salon this afternoon no doubt I shall find her, as I did last Sunday, with her kind, tired face bent over the work-basket, putting strings and buttons and tuckers to little garments, just as she had put them on any other day of the week. Sweet, unselfish, tender-hearted German lady, what a boon our blessed Sabbath day would be to her.—Exchange.

HOW TO ACT.

Or How Not To—Macready's Method of "Working Himself" Up.

It looks easy enough to be "natural" on the stage, but it is one of the most difficult things that an actor can do. This appearance of the volition and perfect ease which characterizes the great actors has cost them, Macready says in his "Reminiscences," much time and toil to acquire. It is training, too, that can alone secure a suitable and moderated gesticulation. The commonest fault of actors is to exaggerate natural expressions in order to be effective; but to be effective gestures must be significant, and to be significant they must be rare. Upon this point we find the following interesting comments in the Temple Bar, one of the most entertaining of the London periodicals: "The late Mr. Lewes well observed that to stand still on the stage and not appear a guy, is one of the chief difficulties of the art. Physical qualities in an actor merge into intellectual, and in the matter of elocution it is impossible to distinguish them. A sense of rythm, which is indispensable to an actor who walks in the higher ranges of the art, is an intellectual power. It may indeed be also acquired by a careful tuning of the ear to the rhythmical cadences of the best poetry; but it is still more a natural gift, for in the actor this sense is to all intents and purposes non-existent unless it is able to find spontaneous expression in that perfection of elocution which 'Hamlet' described to the players. The power of self-annihilation, again, involving that of conceiving and realizing character, which is another requirement of the first-rate actor, is a quality which he shares in common with the poet and artist of dramatic genius: and is one which, whatever may be its ultimate origin, is practically a divine gift, for it cannot be reduced to any laws whereby it may be acquired. But meanwhile, in this case, too, careful training and cultivation are essential. 'My long experience of the stage has convinced me,' writes Macready, 'of the necessity of keeping on the day of exhibition, the mind as intent as possible on the subject of portraiture, even to the very moment of entrance on the stage;' and it is reported of this actor that, in the great scene of the third act of the Merchant of Venice, where 'Shylock' has come on in a state of intense rage and grief at the flight of his daughter, he used to spend some minutes behind the scenes, lashing himself into imaginative fury by cursing sotto voce, and shaking violently a ladder fixed against the wall."

The Schoolmaster in Germany.

The reports of our school inspectors often reveal a very remarkable state of things in our schools and among our teachers, but, thank Heaven, they show nothing so bad as the report of an examination of German candidates for the schoolmaster's certificate, which we have just read. One candidate, on being asked what countryman Jesus was, replied that he was an Italian. Another, on being shown a stuffed squirrel and asked to name it, succeeded in doing so, but on being further asked what sort of a squirrel it was, guessed that it was a stuffed one. "Where," continued the examiner, "is this species of squirrel to be found?" "In the dealer's window," was the reply. "What is this?" asked the professor, showing another candidate a butterfly. "That is a butterfly, sir." "No doubt, but what kind of butterfly?" "Mein Gott!" was the answer, "we have so many of them in our parts that we never pay any attention to them." "It is now 4 o'clock here," remarked the examiner to a candidate for honors in geography, "what time is it in London?" "Well, it must be quite as late there," was the reply. "How many square miles does the north pole cover?" was another question, to which came the answer: "No one knows. A great number of people have tried to go there, but not one has succeeded in the attempt." "How do you teach children the difference between the right and left bank of a river?" "I don't teach them that, because there is no river in our parts." Another candidate was shown a skeleton map and asked to name a particular mountain, but he observed the map was a bad one, as the names were not marked on it like the one at home, which was far superior. "Why did the companions of Columbus refuse to go further?" was another question. "Because," replied the candidate, "they had come to the spot where the ship would have tipped over, for you know, sir, the earth is round." These examples will suffice to prove that, if the schoolmaster is generally abroad in Germany, the candidates for that title are not seldom at sea.—Manchester (Eng.) Post.

HE WOULD RUN LIKE LIGHTNING.

[From the Chicago Inter-Ocean.]

Speaking of candidates and records, it is safe to say that if a man could be nominated for the highest office in the land, with as clear a record for being the fittest, safest and the best, as our famous German friend St. Jacobs Oil has, there would be no doubt of an election. Party, creed, or denomination would not enter into the canvass. Many of our most influential citizens are enthusiastic upon the subject of this wonderful oil.

What a Telegram Did.

A piece called the "Death of Lincoln" was produced at Munich in the latter part of 1865. The author resided at a distance from the town, and was communicated with by telegraph concerning two or three important changes. The author wished the murder of Lincoln to be narrated—not to take place on the stage; but the manager was against this, as he was a sensation-lover, and he, therefore, sent a peremptory telegram to the author in these words: "The murder must be committed in the box. Reply quickly." The telegraph employe who received the message was so alarmed that, instead of forwarding it to the address, he communicated it at once to the Commissioner of Police, who in his turn considered the information of sufficient importance to put his brethren of the police on the qui vive at Munich, and the machinery of the law was at once put into operation to arrest the murderous conspirators. Happily the manager was able to convince the authorities, and so the matter ended with a sensation story for the papers, which turned out to be a capital puff preliminary for the piece.

A PHILADELPHIA servant girl was left in charge of a little child while its parents left the city for a journey. Upon their return the house was closed, and the nurse and child gone. After a long search and several days of agonizing suspense, the heart-broken mother found this note pinned to a table-cover: "Mamie is in the child's ward of the almshouse and I have gone away. Kate."

I HAVE suffered from a kidney difficulty for the past ten years, accompanied with nervous spasms. Physicians gave me but temporary relief, but after using three and a half bottles of Warner's Safe Kidney and Liver Cure, my nervous spasms were entirely relieved. My age is 77 years. I recommend this great remedy to all suffering from nervous troubles.

A BURGLAR who had stolen a large sum of money from a house on the Boulevard Voltaire, Paris, was watched by the police after the expiration of a two-year imprisonment, and 14,000 francs in coin, which he had buried under the root of a tree in a public park, were recovered. He was arrested with the treasure in his hands just after he had dug it out from its place of concealment.

Smoking.

The evils of juvenile smoking were considered at a conference of Sunday-school and day-school teachers in Manchester, England. Dr. Emrys-Jones, of the Royal Eye Hospital, who presided, laid special stress upon the injurious influences of tobacco upon the sight, and said he was convinced that the use of tobacco, say of half an ounce a day for ten or fifteen years, resulted in serious injury to the eyes, and sometimes in absolute blindness. Resolutions were adopted setting forth that, as physicians of the highest eminence declare tobacco to be injurious to health and longevity; as smokers smoke to satisfy the same artificial craving which induces drinkers to drink; as careful statistical investigation shows that the smoking teetotaler is five times as liable to break his vow as the non-smoking teetotaler; as smoking is an unmanly leaning on a solace to care and labor, neither sought nor needed by women, enabling the smoker to be idle without growing weary of idleness, tending to take the ambition out of him, and to make him happy when he should be miserable, and content when his divinest duty is discontent; as it is almost impossible to smoke in an inhabited country without causing discomfort or nausea to others; and as, finally, the passion for tobacco has been the cause for many serious fires and disastrous explosions, parents, teachers, and all others who have influence with British boys should warn them against this barbarous habit both by precept and example.

KATE DASHIELL, a Baltimore public charge all her life, has just been buried from Bayview Asylum, where her mother left her, 2 years old, during the cholera epidemic of 1832. Kate never spoke, smiled nor moved during all these years, but had to be fed and tended like a baby. She ceased growing when she was 6 years old, though her head was unusually large, and she used to sit all day rocking herself in a little chair specially made for her.

AUBURN, IND., NOVEMBER 25, 1880.

A FAITHFUL WORKER.

The poet sang centuries ago: "Alas! what differs more than man from man? and whence this difference—whence, but from himself—himself how wondrous then!"

If we turn back the murky pages of the history of time some twenty centuries or more, we find the orphan son of an Athenian sword-cutter enamored of eloquence. He resolved to be himself eloquent. We see him alone on Mount Phalerus amid the thunder and lightning, lifting his feeble and stammering voice to give it force; and then again by the seashore with pebble-stones in his mouth, while his harangues are heard above the roar of the waters. What is the result of this long, continued application? All Greece flocked in crowds to Athens to hear him speak, and hung with rapture on his tongue. The untiring perseverance of a Columbus discovered new worlds. The lad who traveled on foot from New York to Philadelphia in search of employment, in after life chained the lightning of heaven. The young man who shouldered his axe and started for the west, we find some years afterward in the halls of congress, advocating the rights of man and the blessings of our free government. The young man who built his log cabin—the rail-splitter and mule-driver, become presidents of this great and growing republic. Examples of men who have arisen to eminence and distinction by their own exertion, meet us on every hand, showing us that the road to honor and preferment is open to all.

It is not the academy that makes the student—it only affords the opportunity, but a determined, laborious, persevering research. But we are digressing from the object of this article. We did not intend to write a dissertation to young men, but to speak of one of our citizens who is about to leave us, and whose example is worthy of imitation by all.

Rev. Henry Johnson came to our city some years ago, at the urgent request of a friend, and his only acquaintance here, and took charge as pastor of the Presbyterian church, under very discouraging circumstances. The church and congregation were small, with but very little harmonious zeal for work in any way.

Mr. Johnson being young in years, as well as in practice in his chosen profession, the impression was that he was too young to be successful in so unpromising a field of labor. We should have an older man, was whispered on all sides. But with a zeal and energy that knows not failure, and with his eye ever fixed on the bright morning star that always guided him over the rough places in his career onward and upward, he has succeeded far beyond the expectation of the most credulous. His success may be summed up in a few words:

The small, dilapidated frame building which was used for a place of worship, sabbath-schools, social meetings, as well as all business in the interest of the church, has given place to a large new brick edifice completely furnished, with a basement for social and business meetings, and is acknowledged to be one of the finest church buildings in this part of the state.

The membership of the church has been increased, we believe, one hundred and seventy. During a series of meetings one winter, over 100 united with the church, a large number being heads of families and solid business men.

Mr Johnson has the proud satisfaction of leaving the largest, and one of the finest congregations in our town; one noticeable feature of which is the large number of young people in attendance. Mr. Johnson has had the peculiar faculty of drawing around him a large class of young men who will deeply regret his departure from among us. The best eulogy that could be pronounced upon him as a preacher of the gospel, is the success which has attended his ministrations while among us; and one great reason for that success is, that he always preaches the gospel of Christ, and, like the disciples on the mount of transfiguration, when the clouds had been lifted they saw no man save Jesus only. And during the terrible excitement of the political campaign just passed, Mr. Johnson, in the pulpit, saw and preached no man save Jesus only.

During the stay of Mr. Johnson with us, pastor and people have been united in brotherly love and kindness, and part with each other with mutual regret and sadness; in fact this whole community, without regard to sect, join in mutual regret at his departure.

He married his wife here, and we might say commenced life with us, and is so identified with the community that it touches the heart-strings of this people to part with him, but what will be our loss will be others' gain.

The christian religion in all cases of sorrow, sadness and despondency cheers us with the bright hope that there is a better land where parting shall never come, and our friend and brother can rejoice that a day will come when rich jewels will be added to his crown of rejoicing in mansions not made by hands, eternal in the heavens. Mr. Johnson goes to his new field of labor with the blessing and good wishes of this whole community. He goes to Grand Haven, Mich., to succeed Rev. Dr. Sullivan. We congratulate the First Presbyterian church at Grand Haven in its acquisition of pastor.

Death of Governor Williams.

Governor James D. Williams died last Saturday, at 12:30, from inflammation of the bladder. He was taken sick on the evening of the presidential election and never left his room after retiring that night. He was born in Pickaway county, Ohio, January 16, 1808, and his age was 72 years, 10 months and 4 days. He enjoyed the respect and confidence of men of all political parties, and made the world better by having lived in it. Brought up to hard work, and with the educational advantages of the common schools of Knox county, this state, he grew up respected and honored by his neighbors. He represented that portion of the state in the state senate and house for more than a quarter of a century, with fidelity to his constituents. In 1874 he was honored by being elected to the forty-fourth congress. It 1876 his party nominated him for governor, and he was elected by a majority of 5,139 votes. Of his gubernatorial career even his political opponents must speak with respect. His homely manners were ridiculed, and it was said that he was incompetent. His record shows a wise and economical administration.

Governor Williams experienced a sad affliction about six months ago when he lost his wife. Since then he has not been well, but he attended to the business of the state with his usual fidelity. During the late political campaign he made several speeches in his customary earnest manner. After the election he was prostrated by a severe cold and his strength gradually failed, until last Thursday he became very much worse. The last official act of Gov. Williams was the respite of Wade, sentenced to be hung for murder, for ninety days, upon the petition of the prosecuting attorney, as the state desired Wade as a witness in the case of Mrs. Brown, who was granted a new trial by the supreme court.

"Blue Jeans" Williams, full of years and full of honors, has passed from the scenes of this life to join his wife, but will be accorded a place in the hearts of this people, and in the history of his state, which he loved, as an honest, patriotic ruler.

DONN PIATT TO GARFIELD.

An Open Letter From the Noted Journalist,

Who Talks to the President-Elect Like a Brother.

The Mentor Statesman Reminded That He is Not a Great Man.

A special dispatch to the Boston Globe, of November 14, says Donn Piatt, in to-day's Capital publishes an open letter addressed to Hon. J. A. Garfield, which, owing to the friendly relations known to exist between these two gentlemen, has produced a decided sensation, and has been the theme of conversation in the hotel lobbies, to-day. The letter is quite long. The following are brief extracts therefrom:

MY DEAR GENERAL: Now that this senseless political row is over, and you are the president-elect, I venture, before you are buried in that mansion, through the thick walls and plate glass of which no word of truth ever reaches the incumbent, to write you a few words in the same intimate and friendly spirit that marked our intercourse when we both occupied a cheap boarding-house; when I carried my fortunes on the slender nib of a pen as a newspaper correspondent, and you sought to support yourself and family on the meager pay of a congressman. I go back to the time when you gladly accepted my aid and sympathy in your troubles, and my heart-felt congratulations in your triumphs, and I yours. I feel more anxiety about you, my friend, now that you are fortunate, than in the darkest hour of your life, when life itself seemed so horrible that an escape from it was a temptation. You have passed from the hands of friends to the keeping of enemies to play the part of chief executive for four years. He tells General Garfield that he is not only no politician, but is hated by the politicians, and that history never has, and probably never will, put on record such an infamy as that upon which he was elected. He then continues: "We have among us certain persons who are bent on changing the form of our self-government. They seek to make the presidency a life tenure, and under the name of a stronger government escape the return of power to the people. You know the man who is to serve their purpose in the treasonable scheme they base upon his military record and supposed popularity." Mr. Piatt warns General Garfield against the politicians who are determined, as he has indicated, to change the form of government, and hopes that he will have nothing to do with them except looking to breaking their power. He uses the following language which has attracted more attention than any other part of his letter: "It was your committee that investigated that national shame (Black Friday) wherein Fisk, Gould and Grant sought, through a use of the national treasury, to enrich themselves at the expense of thousands of honest men. It is not my purpose to recall the details of that infamy. The chief criminal was tracked to the threshold of the executive mansion and your committee passed a resolution calling upon the president to appear before the committee and defend himself from the damning proof that made him the chief conspirator. The night of the day that the resolution was passed you called with it upon the president. It was after midnight before you left the white house, amazed and sick at heart, and, at your suggestion, that very day the resolution was revoked. I need not say that you and I know why that resolution was so suddenly abandoned. The fact that under the circumstances it was revoked tells the whole story. The very democrats of the committee shrunk from the threatened exposure." The letter closes as follows: "But you are not a great man. You read in your library of heroic achievements; your soul swells over the poetic expression; you are full of thought and impulse, and all ends in a support of men you despise and a party with which you have nothing in common."

The Eloquence of Silence.

Here is a stray bit of advice which the COURIER believes will profit any one who may heed it: You have trouble—your feelings are injured, your husband is unkind, your wife frets, your home is not pleasant and your friends do not treat you fairly. Well, what of it? Keep it to yourself. A smouldering fire can be found and extinguished, but when the coals are scattered who can pick them up? Bury your sorrow. A cut finger is not benefited by pulling off the plaster and exhibiting it under somebody's eye. Tie it up and let it alone. It will get well quicker than you can cure it. Charity covereth a multitude of sins. Things thus covered are often cured without a scar, but once published and confided to meddling friends there is no end to the trouble they may cause. Keep it to yourself. Troubles are transient, and when sorrow is healed and past, what a comfort it is to say: "No one ever knew it until the trouble was over."

A Long Series of Resolutions Passed by The Democratic Editors of Northern Indiana.

FORT WAYNE, Nov. 19.—At a meeting of the democratic editors of northern Indiana, held in this city to-day, the political situation of the country and the future of the democratic party were elaborately discussed. After a full and free interchange of opinions, it was unanimously agreed that the following points should at once be pressed upon the attention of the American people:

1. A change of the constitution of the United States providing for the election of a president and vice-president by the popular vote. The cumbersome, and in many respects dangerous, machinery of the electoral college and the supervisory power of congress, in a partisan sense, has made manifest the necessity of a radical change in this particular.

2. The election of United States senators by the people of the several states, instead of by the legislature thereof. The step is deemed necessary in order to free, as far as possible, the election of members of the legislature from purely partisan considerations, to the end that legislation may be secured in accordance with the domestic wants of the state.

3. A judicious revision of the present unjust and discriminating tariff in the interests of the producing and industrious classes. The work to be performed under the guidance of men capable of dealing intelligently with the question of a political economy instead of pandering to the whims and crude notions of mere demagogues and stipendaries.

4. Vigorous opposition to the introduction of cheap Mongolian labor, with a view to preserving and promoting the dignity of intelligent labor.

5. Appropriate legislation by congress for the taxation of greenbacks like other money.

6. Cultivation of a wholesome public sentiment in opposition to the controlling of elections by the dependents of the national administration, high and low, and against the exercise of coercive measures on the part of corporations in interfering with the elective franchise of their employes.

7. A movement for securing the holding of elections in all the states at once, and the same day, to-wit: On the first Tuesday after the first Monday in November.

8. Believing that the prosperous condition of the country, so far as the same may have been affected by legislation, furnishes abundant proof of the wisdom of a democratic congress in restoring to the people the use of silver money and prohibiting the further retirement of greenbacks, we protest against any tinkering with finances of the country, and hereby express an unqualified condemnation of the presumptuous proposition of Secretary Sherman.

9. A demand upon the present congress to institute a thorough and searching investigation of the charges that the apparent majority for Garfield and Arthur in the state of New York was obtained by fraudulent and illegal means, to the end that justice may be done to all parties, and for the removal of all doubt from the minds of the advocates of pure elections, as to the genuineness of the ballot so that if it shall appear upon such investigation that Mr. Garfield is justly entitled to the electoral vote of New York, he may enjoy the respect of the entire people as the lawfuly president of the United States. If, on the other hand, it should be made to appear plainly and unmistakably that the result in New York was brought about by fraudulent means, and in violation of the election laws of that state, we demand of congress a firm and unyielding stand in favor of such action as will secure to the people the noble soldier and statesman, Winfield Scott Hancock, as their chief executive officer.

—Johnny McIntyre and Johnny McKay are now learning the telegraph business, under the management of Frank Copper, at the Saginaw.

—Now would be a good time to purchase stoves. We learn from our dealers that the competition is so great that the profits upon this article is very small.

—Now the squeal of the porker is heard far and near. The next thing in order, after butchering, is to see who can have the biggest hog story published.

—The fathers of marriageable daughters will have to lay in an extra supply of coal. These long, cold winter evenings demand an increase over last year.

—Balmoral skirts for 35, 40 and 75 cents; felt skirts for 50, 75, $1.00 and up to $300; ladies' wool hosiery, children's hose, ladies' nubias, at McQuiston & Ralston's.

—Miss Jossie Rusof, this place, has accepted a position in the public school at Spencerville. What will trustee Jordan, of Corunna, do for a teacher this winter?

—Hank Little's celebrated Mustang pony ran away Saturday night, spilling Hank, nineteen heads of Dutch cabbage and his son all over the street in front of the postoffice.

—Brown Matheny, the jovial, good-natured Brown, is shaking hands this week with his numerous friends here. He is now employed on the Muncie & Cincinnati railroad as fireman.

—Gents' all-wool scarlet shirts and drawers, gents' merino shirts and drawers, gents' undershirts from 25 cents to $1.50 each, at McQuiston & Ralston's. 48 3.

—The evening freight on the Fort Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw railroad going south, has come in late for several days. The trouble is, she has too much to do. This speaks well for the Saginaw, however.

—Mark Rush, who has been working at the Saginaw depot for several weeks, left Tuesday last to accept a position as night operator on the Air Line road at Waterloo.

—What unbounded cheek some people do exhibit; and from what we learn, several of the more dark complected individuals with the South Carolinians have their share. For particulars see Tom Gross.

—One sad-eyed, inebriated male inhabitant of this wicked world, whose name we did not learn, followed Marshal Scott to the cooler Wednesday morning, and became so fascinated with the interior that Tom had to leave him.

—The first division of the M. E. society will entertain the social at the lecture room on Wednesday evening. Refreshments served at half-past five. Persons will please furnish themselves with napkins. All are cordially invited to attend. Secretary.

—List of unclaimed letters in the postoffice at Auburn, Nov. 22, 1880: Jacob Breckville, Samuel Cassells, B. F. Dickerson, O. W. Dunham, Dr. G. W. Green, Henry Klink, Mrs. Mary Leathy, John Thomas.

Jos. Rainier, P. M.

—The Buffalo Express says the reason men succeed who "mind their own business," is because there is so little competition in that line.

—The boom increases every day at Isaac Ochs'. He is giving tremendous bargains in all kinds of goods. Bottom knocked clear out of boots, shoes and rubber goods.

—The undergrowth of Auburn have organized a literary society, and will hold their meetings in the soldiers hall. Tuesday evening they will tackle the question, "Who killed Cock Robin?"

—Extra preparations are being made by the ladies of the Presbyterian church to have their dinner gotten up in fine style. Call to-day and get a square meal, and thank the Lord for at least one during the year.

—The engine of the passenger train on the Ft. Wayne, Jackson & Saginaw, due here at 3:22 p. m., broke down at Pleasant lake yesterday, and the train was delayed until they could send to Jackson for another engine, and did not arrive here until six o'clock.

—The tailoring establishment of G. H. Yesbera has been crowded with work for the past two months, and is still very busy. He will have another tailor this week, and will get in a new line of piece goods. If you want a good and cheap suit of clothes go and see him.

First-class, emigrant and round-trip railroad tickets to all points east or west can be bought at low rates by calling upon the undersigned at Auburn Junction, or addressing —As Rev. Mr. Johnson, of the Presbyterian church, is about to close his successful pastorate here, there will be a reception and donation in his behalf in the audience room of the church, on next Tuesday evening, given by the ladies' society. Supper, including oysters, 35 cents. A cordial invitation is extended to all.

—Goshen Democrat: An own cousin of James Gordon Bennet, the millionaire proprietor of the N. Y. Herald, is supporting herself, a crippled husband and their children, by teaching music at South Bend. The lady is a daughter of J. A. Bennett, a brother of James Gordon, Sr. He was a wealthy South Carolina planter, ruined by the war. Such is life.

—Where is that hook-and-ladder company? The boys had better organize again, and keep a company together. The trucks are all here and paid for, and will never be of any use unless our citizens take an interest in the matter. A good fire company is not a bad thing to have around, and we could just as well have one as not, if some one would only start the movement.

—In the issue of the Courier of November 11, was an item clipped from the Kendallville News, which stated that Mr. R. Wes McBride, of Waterloo, had induced one Vall. Zimmerman, a minor, to vote at the last election. Such became a rumor, and as an item of news merely we clipped it. Affidavits of responsible parties have proven the charge against him without foundation, and in justice to Mr. McBride, who is considered by men of all political parties as an honorable gentlemen, we cheerfully make this correction.

—The building occupied by F. E. Davenport as a drug-store, took fire Sunday evening about five o'clock. The fire originated in the office of Dr. D. J. Swartz, on the second floor, and had gotten under good headway before it was discovered, but the prompt response and hard work of our citizens succeeded in saving the building. Had the flames had just a little more start, several buildings would probably have been destroyed. The drug stock of Mr. Davenport and the dry-goods of Mr. S. W. Ralston in the adjoining building were damaged in the removal, and the insurance appraiser has allowed the former $195.80, and the latter $50 for loss. This narrow escape from a disastrous conflagration should serve as a warning to our citizens, whose facilities for checking fire are meagre.

Christmas is Coming.

In a little while christmas will be upon us again. The rich and the poor, the old and the young alike greet the return of merry Christmas. As Jehovah upon this date made his greatest gift to a sinful world, so we commemorate its return by giving good gifts to our wives our cousins, our uncles, our aunts, children and sweethearts. To the readers of the Courier, we wish to say that the most elegant line of holiday goods ever brought to Auburn can be found at the jewelry establishment of Joseph Abright. Mr. Abright has had large experience in the jewelry business, and has good taste in all matters pertaining to it. He has got on a large stock expressly to supply the holiday trade, and everything belonging to a first-class jewelry store can be found there, such as gold watches, gold chains, rings, necklaces, ladies' gold guard chains, breastpins, shirt-studs, silver knives and forks, and tea-sets, napkin-rings, glass sets, silver cups, inlaid with gold, gold spectacles, sleeve-buttons, clocks and a thousand other things suitable for the holidays. In buying presents remember this establishment.

AT THE FIRE SUNDAY.

How Laughable it Was to See

Frank Davenport get excited.

Rev. Norris throwing buckets.

Frank Benedict break in the door.

Billy Little lugging out hop-bitters.

G. H. Yesbera carrying out empty cigar-boxes.

Fred. Davis carrying out empty tobacco-pails.

Chris. Baldock on the roof holding to the chimney.

P. J. Lockwood vacating his office after the fire was extinguished.

Our Con. carrying water in a two-quart pail from the livery barn.

Charley Pommert come running after the fire was out, and asking who was fighting.

Old Mr. Clark doing the circular work at the town pump in front of the bakery.

Ben. Williams trying to break in the gable-end of the building after the fire was out.

Charley Groscup, with hat and coat off, trying to walk off with Mr. Davenport's safe.

Grant Griswold leaning up against the bakery, and wondering if the building could be saved.

Dave Snyder with a Babcock fire extinguisher strapped on his back trying to climb a ladder.

Isaac Hachtel astride the roof calling for a pile-driver, or something else, to tear off a few shingles.

Elias J. Coder with an armful of Ayer's '79 almanacs trying to get them in Hollister's refrigerator.

Dr. Sears with his coat frozen so stiff that it was impossible for him to get it off until he thawed it out.

Billy Shaffer standing in the middle of the street with his coat off and hair standing straight up, hollowing fire!

Some rural chap, with a glass eye and his ears hung on the bias, rush out with a chandelier and throw it against a hitching-post and break it.

Elzy Shaffer come running with the joker of a euchre-deck in his hand. We wonder what he could have been doing with such a thing on Sunday?

Billy Ryan, that young giant, rushing out of Mr. Ralston's store with one roll of cotton-batting—he carried it clear over to the court-yard fence without stopping to rest, too.

More or less excitement prevails at all fires, but this one took the cake. Probably the excited crowd would have been more reconciled had Uncle James Griswold been there to oversee it. However, Deryus Houghton kept Jack Ralston quiet long enough to tell Mr. Davenport that the building was out of danger, and not to get excited.

Institute Proceedings.

Report of the teachers' quarterly Sunday-school institute held at Sedan, Richland township, November 20, 1880:

Institute was called to order by the president, after which a few minutes was occupied in devotional exercises. The welcome address, by Y. W. Treesh, was followed by a welcome song by the institute. After the reading of the secretary's report, the institute was addressed by L. Harding, on the subject of "the best methods of decreasing pauperism through Sunday-school work." Additional remarks by Mrs. Hyne, A. Britton and L. Rice. Song, "What will the recompense be?" "How can we best secure the attendance of the young men at Sunday-school?" This question was discussed by Mr. Zies, of Corunna, and others. Song, "O, give me a heart full of love." The exercises of the afternoon were opened by singing, "There's a light in the bible." Prayer by L. Rice. Song. Rev. L. Rice gave his opinion of the quotation from Edward Eggleston, viz: "We, as Sunday-school workers, have cared too much for soul-saving in a narrow sense, and not enough for character building in a wide sense." Rev. Rice plainly showed that in the Sunday-school the plan of salvation can be taught, and also that of character building. Song, "Tempt me not." "The aims and objects of Sunday-school teachers," was discussed by Messrs. Britton, Rice, Harding and Mrs. Ehlers, of Auburn. After a song, Mrs. Ehlers gave her views on infant class teaching. It is needless to say that justice was done to the subject. Mrs. Hyne's remarks on the same subject were excellent and to the point. She would have us carry our business talent with us in our work as teachers of children. Then followed reports of the Sunday-schools in the township. Song, "Cheerfully marching along," after which the meeting adjourned to meet at West Richland, on the last Saturday in February, 1881.

L. Harding, Prest.

Liquor License.

Notice is hereby given to the citizens of the incorporated town of Garrett and Keyser township, in DeKalb county, Indiana, that I will make application to the board of commissioners of said county, at their next regular session, commencing December 6, 1880, for license to retail spirituous, vinous and malt liquors in a less quantity than a quart at a time, with the privilege of having the same drank on the premises where sold. Said business to be carried on in the town of Garrett, on lot No. twenty-two, block No. 17

Nov. 10, 1880. George Riele.

LETTER FROM KANSAS.

Editor Courier, Dear Sir:—I have been to Kansas, and am here now satisfying myself of the truth or falsity of the [illegible] reports we of the east have [illegible], and feeling that some of our citizens would be pleased to know of [illegible] country, I beg of you to give [illegible] my impressions. I am convinced [illegible] thing fully since coming here, and that is that the state of Kansas is to-day suffering an injustice from the action of the railroad companies—in that it is the policy of the railroads to carry immigration to the extreme western portion of the state instead of allowing it to stop in the better and more fertile counties of the eastern part of the state. Emigrants are carried through this portion of the state by night when they cannot see it, and next day are landed away out in the western part of the state, where it is impossible for the poor settler, at present, to live and support himself without having a large capital. Your correspondent was induced to go through to Gow county, and was not pleased with that portion of the state, but concluded to examine further, and hence came east slowly, stopping at the various town on the way, until he reached the little town of Ogden, Riley county, where I had the pleasure of finding my old acquaintance, Wm. Whitacre and his son Elias, running a hotel, seeming to be perfectly satisfied with the country. At this point I found a western law suit in progress, in which my friend Sam. Kimble, as he is familiarly called, was engaged on one side, and G. S. Green of this state, on the other. These two gentlemen persuaded me to stop over in Manhattan, the county-seat of Riley county, and I feel glad I have done so. After arriving in Manhattan, Mr. Kimble showed me as much of the city as could be seen in a brief visit, and then we climbed the hill called Bluemont, north of the city, and looked over a scope of fertile farming country unsurpassed anywhere. Manhattan is really a very fortunately located city of 2,800 inhabitants, located at the junction of the Big Blue and Kansas rivers, and having about it the best farming country, perhaps, in the state. Stock raising, and that of a very high grade, is engaged in extensively. The city of Manhattan can boast of more wealthy men, in proportion to its population, than any other town in the state. A man coming to Kansas and doing business, whether farming or otherwise, and using the same economy and thriftiness that characterize people in the east, cannot help getting rich. I feel satisfied that the western portion of Kansas is not suited to agriculture, but the eastern portion of the state cannot be surpassed. I would not advise settlers to go to the western counties expecting to farm, but you cannot do much better than to examine eastern Kansas if you want a good home, and a good living.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

THE proposition of a New York paper to raise a Presidential pension fund is being briskly responded to in that city. Hon. Edwin D. Morgan heads the list with $5,000, conditional that $250,000 is subscribed before Jan. 1. John H. Starin places his name down for $2,500. Other subscriptions are George Jones, $1,000; Anson G. McCook, $250; Thomas L. James, $250, and A. J. Dittenhoefer, $100.... Two burglars entered the house of Thomas O'Brien, a Syracuse merchant, and with a carpenter's hammer brained Mr. and Mrs. O'Brien while they were sleeping in bed. O'Brien's condition is very precarious, and there is no hope of Mrs. O'Brien's recovery.

MASSACHUSETTS, according to the official census report, has a population of 1,783,085. The females exceed the males by 66,044. The number of persons of foreign birth is 443,116, and there are 19,004 colored persons....William V. Grover, a 50-year-old husband of Red Bank, N. J., has shot and killed his 13-year-old wife.

KENWARD PHILP has been held for trial at New York on charge of criminal libel, and remains at large on his bond of $5,000. Judge Noah Davis, in reviewing the case thought Hart, the publisher of the Truth, displayed reasonable caution before publishing the Morey letter, but the course of Hon. Abram Hewitt he declared to be thoroughly reprehensible. The Judge regards the letter as altogether a forgery. Mr. Hewitt, smarting under the reflections of Judge Davis, retorts that the letter was published before he had ever seen Mr. Hart or the original, of which event Judge Davis must have been informed; and that when a man becomes a Judge he should cease to be a partisan.

YOUNG Willie Sprague, son of ex-Senator Sprague, who was arrested for shooting at Robert Thompson, his mother's trustee, has been discharged from custody, it having been proved that the shot was fired at a bird instead of at Thompson....After a contest of ninety minutes, in Pittsburgh, John McMahon, of Vermont, defeated W. J. Farrell, of California, for the champion wrestler's belt....P. K. Barger, of Scranton, Pa., has been sentenced to eight years in the penitentiary for embezzlement.

IN a church at East Cambridge, Mass., last Sunday, Miss Jennie Smith announced that after sixteen years of intense suffering her sight had been restored and her useless limbs renewed solely through prayer.

A TRAIN on the Lehigh Valley road jumped the track near Pittston, Pa. By the upsetting of a stove in the foremost car, in which were most of the passengers, the car was set on fire, and several of the passengers were severely, one fatally, burned. A brakeman was killed instantly, the fireman was fatally injured, and the engineer and a second brakeman were very badly hurt.

CAPT. YOUNG, of the ill-fated steamer Narragansett, has been held to bail by the United States Commissioner at Norwich, Ct., to answer the charge of criminal negligence and misconduct, causing the collision with the Stonington....A notable wedding in official circles occurred at Harrisburg, Pa. Senator Don Cameron's daughter and the son of Justice Bradley, of the Supreme Court of the United States, were the bride and groom....The New York Grand Jury has found an indictment against Kenward Philp for libel against Gen. Garfield.

SALVINI, the great Italian tragedian, has arrived in New York, and is under engagement for 100 nights in the principal cities.... The Reading road has been authorized by the courts to issue $34,000,000 in deferred income bonds.

THE WEST.

DEPUTY MARSHAL THOMAS, at Socorro, New Mexico, was compelled to disarm a troublesome gambler, named Gordon. In the evening the latter assassinated the Marshal at a poker table, firing nine shots into his body, and walked away unmolested....Three murderers and a horse-thief escaped from the Las Vegas (Col.) jail. A posse pursued and overtook them. The jail-birds showed fight, and two of the murderers, Allen and Davidson, were killed. Another of the party was wounded, but managed to make his escape....Petroleum was struck at Ponca, Neb., at a depth of 584 feet by workmen digging for coal.

BENJ. H. SKINNER, an old and popular Chicago hotel man, is dead....Ogden, Utah, will have in operation in January, from a flag-staff on the Court House, four electric lights of 3,000 candle-power, each of which is guaranteed to illuminate a mile in diameter....The lines of the Chicago and Northwestern railroad last year earned a net income of $9,405,400. Five passengers were killed and five were injured, according to the admission of the managers of the great corporation.

A TELEGRAM from St. Peter, Minn., dated the 15th inst., says: "At a late hour to-night fire broke out in the insane asylum at this place, containing about 600 patients. This building, which was one of the finest edifices in the country devoted to the care of insane persons, was burned to the ground. At this writing it is thought that from 150 to 200 of the inmates have perished in the flames."

SITTING BULL, who some time ago evinced a disposition to surrender, now bids defiance to the United States Government, and says he will fight to the bitter end, that he will die rather than surrender, and his warriors seem to share his hostile sentiments, and dare Gen. Miles to attack them, threatening him with Custer's fate if he does....The people of St. Louis were greatly disappointed at the result of the census taken of that city in June last, and at their urgent request a new enumeration was ordered by Secretary Schurz. The result is the crediting of the city with a population of 340,364, or about 10,000 in excess of the June count....Capt. Payne telegraphs Gen. Pope that his colony is actively preparing for a second invasion of Indian Territory, and that open house will be kept for army officers at Oklahoma City during the holidays....The latest lake horror reported is the capsizing of the schooner Carrington, twenty-five miles southeast of Milwaukee. All on board were lost.

THE St. Louis and Southeastern railroad has been sold under foreclosure for $3,200,000 to the Louisville and Nashville Railroad Company....The gross earnings of the Chicago and Northwestern railway for the last fiscal year were $16,155,122, and the operating expenses $6,749,723, leaving a balance on the right side of the ledger of $9,405,399.... A coal-bed has been discovered near Ponca, Neb., about twenty-two miles west of Sioux City. The vein is four and a half feet thick, and about 585 feet below the surface. Petroleum has also been discovered in the vicinity thirty-five feet nearer the surface....A Chicago newspaper reporter went on an investigating tour through the city and discovered fifteen butter factories in full working order. The "butter" made in these concerns is a compound of various ingredients—soapstone, lard, tallow, and fatty substances.... An official report gives the wheat product of Ohio, in the present year, as 52,522,791 bushels, against 41,452,129 bushels in 1879. The average production per acre, this year, was eighteen and three-tenths bushels, against seventeen and seven-tenths bushels in 1879. Ohio claims that these figures make her the first wheat-producing State in the Union this year, but Illinois and Indiana are still to be heard from.

WHEN Daniel Burt, a watchman in a Cleveland rolling-mill, left home for work, the other night, his wife and three children were well, and his 9-year-old daughter followed him to the gate to kiss him. When he returned the following morning, the house was locked, and no sign of life. Climbing through a window, he was horrified to find the whole family lying senseless, a powerful odor of gas from the base-burner stove pervading the air. The little daughter who last kissed him was dead. The mother and an 11-year-old daughter on the bed and an infant on the floor were unconscious. A neighbor's daughter visiting was also insensible, and a woman friend of the family was sitting at the foot in a semi-conscious condition. The last-named may recover. The others will probably die....Jay Gould has purchased the Denver and South Park railroad, paying therefor about $2,500,000, hoping to dictate terms to the Denver and Rio Grande line.

REV. JAMES B. CORRINGTON, famous a quarter century ago as a co-laborer of Peter Cartwright, passed away at St. Louis the other day....Mary Gilbert, widow of the engineer killed in the memorable collision at Jackson, Mich., last year, has sued the Michigan Central road for $10,000, and has been tendered $3,000 as a compromise....Three more unfortunates in the St. Peter asylum have died from the inhalation of smoke, making thirteen fatalities. Ten others are reported as burned fatally, and eight are missing....The Milwaukee Chamber of Commerce has taken possession of the commodious stone structure erected for its use by Alexander Mitchell, closing the ceremonies by a banquet of rare attractions....A nephew of John C. Calhoun, residing at Candelaria, Nev., has become insane from a wound received during the war....The new census of St. Louis is completed, and shows a population of 360,915. The gain on the previous enumeration is 17,000.

THE SOUTH.

THE National Cotton Exchange reports that 1,507,945 bales of cotton of this year's crop has been shipped from Southern ports, or by rail to Northern manufacturing points. This is an increase over the shipments at this time last year of 167,781 bales....Dr. John Y. Porter, Assistant Surgeon in the United States army, telegraphs from Key West that there have been ten cases of yellow fever at that point, of which two were fatal.

THE Agricultural Bureau reports the cotton-crop prospect in North and South Carolina and Florida as promising an increase of from 7 to 15 per cent. over last year. In Alabama and in the Lower Mississippi valley the heavy rains have damaged the growing crop, and a decrease in the yield as compared with last year is probable. In Texas there is prospect of an increase of from 18 to 20 per cent. in the yield over that of last year.

THE Lipan Indians, who have lately been pillaging both sides of the Rio Grande in Texas and Mexico, have been badly punished by a band of Mexican volunteers.

A SPECIAL train carrying four companies of the Sixteenth infantry struck a broken rail, near Corsicana, Texas, ditching four coaches. Twenty-five men were wounded, several seriously....Three children died at Wilmington, Del., after having eaten uncooked sweet potatoes, the vines of which had been sprinkled with Paris green.

SOMETHING novel in the way of a cause for suicide was developed in North Carolina, where a young lady hanged herself through mortification at the defeat of her father for the Legislature....An Arkansas man named Ford secreted himself in some bushes, near Texarkana, and killed Dr. Caldwell as he rode by. A horse trade had previously made trouble between the assassin and his target.

POLITICAL.

AT a meeting of the Democratic National Committee in New York, last week, an address was issued denying that they ever took any action in reference to the Morey letter, or even saw it until its publication. A resolution was passed, recommending that in the States where election frauds have been perpetrated the Democratic committees investigate with a view to exposure and punishment, but declaring that the National Committee cannot be charged with responsibility as to the duties of courts or Congress.

OFFICIAL returns from the ninety-nine counties in Iowa show the following result: For Garfield, 183,954; for Hancock, 105,328; for Weaver, 33,590; scattering, 470. Outside of New York city the Garfield electors in the State have 62,218 majority.

WASHINGTON.

GEN. SHERMAN denies the report that he is seeking a place on the retired list....Gen. McCook recommends Congress to pass a law authorizing the enlistment of 150 young men—being one for each military post—who are qualified to act as schoolmasters, and who shall have the rank and pay of Commissary Sergeants.

WASHINGTON advices are to the effect that Gen. Schofield's report upon the Whittaker case, and his observations upon the association of white and colored cadets at West Point, will probably lead to his removal from his position as Commandant there.

JUSTICE CLIFFORD, of the Supreme Court, who was struck with paralysis some weeks ago, still lies helpless. He has recovered his speech partly and can articulate, but his mind has hardly rallied from the shock, and it is doubtful if he will ever recover.

THE Treasury Department has instructed the Assistant Treasurer at New York to reject all offers to sell the 6 per cents. falling due the last day of December. The Secretary refused to pay the price asked, fixing 102½ as the limit which the department would offer.... The value of the gold coin and bullion in this country is estimated at $454,012,030; of silver coin and bullion at $158,271,327.

GEN. MILES has been appointed Chief of the Signal Service. He entered the war as a Captain in the Twenty-second Massachusetts, and rose to be a Major General of volunteers.

GENERAL.

BRADSTREET'S revised estimates of the wheat crop of 1880 show a total of 455,649,000 bushels, the surplus for export being placed at 190,724,000 bushels....A terrible explosion occurred on the 12th inst. in the Ford coal-pit, at Stellarton, N. S. The men on the north side calmly continued their labors, and were greatly surprised at dinner time to learn what had happened. Those on the south side, numbering nearly sixty, were instantly covered and maimed by huge blocks of coal dislodged by the concussion. Three men, who volunteered, found it impossible to explore the south side for any distance, on account of afterdamp. Six sufferers were taken out in a dying condition, and the names of thirty-two were recorded as missing.

UNDER the authority of the convocation of Canterbury, a commission of English and American scholars has completed a revision of the New Testament, sitting forty-seven days. ....Gen. Ord, commanding the Department of Texas, reports that nine men were killed and two men wounded and one captured by the Indians since the 1st of October, 1879. The General complains of a large number of desertions from the ranks. He recommends that a large force be maintained on the Rio Grande to preserve order in that turbulent, robber-infested quarter.

A DISPATCH of the 16th inst., from St. John, N. B., says that "tremendous fires continue to rage in the Stellarton mine, but, with the aid of steam pumps and fire engines, the pit is being rapidly flooded, and the diminution in the volume of smoke from the shafts indicates the flames are being subdued. There remains little, if any, prospect of the recovery of the bodies of the victims of the disaster."

THE wheat yield for the past season, as shown by the Agricultural Bureau report, exhibits an increase of about 81,000,000 bushels in the crop of the United States in the past ten years....Fire consumed the depot of the New Orleans, Chicago and St. Louis railroad, at the former city, the loss being $30,000. Aikin & McLaren's knitting-mill, at West Sand Lake, N. Y., was burned by an incendiary, wiping out $35,000. The Windsor Hotel, at Denver, was damaged $10,000 by water thrown by firemen. John Knight's tannery, at Manchester, Mass., has been burned; loss, $50,000.

An appeal on behalf of the widows and orphans, made such by the Stellarton mine explosion, has been issued to the Mayors and Wardens of the various towns throughout Canada. The appeal sets forth that fifty men and boys were killed, and that thirty-three wives have been widowed and 110 children orphaned.

THE Congress of Santo Domingo has, by legislative enactment, settled that it is the earthly remains of Christopher Columbus that were found in the cathedral three years ago. Provision is accordingly made for the erection of a suitable monument, toward which Santo Domingo gives $10,000 and invites all other American governments to contribute.... The American Humane Society, at its session at Philadelphia, last week, appointed a committee to urge upon Congress the passage of a more efficient law to prevent cruelty to animals. ....The schooner Abraham Lincoln has been lost off the coast of Liberia, thirty persons finding graves in the sea.

NEW YORK detectives have run down Stephen C. Bradwell, a commercial traveler, who has forged notes to the amount of $25,000 on the Spanish Bank of Havana, and who sold an officer a valise full at 30 cents on the dollar.

FOREIGN.

AN audacious robbery has been perpetrated in Rue St. Vinno, Paris, bank notes of the value of 600,000 francs having been stolen from a postman....All the Nihilists tried for attempts against the life of the Czar have been found guilty by the Military Court at St. Petersburg. Five of the convicted were sentenced to death, and eleven to hard labor in the mines for life. Three female Nihilists were sentenced to fifteen years' penal servitude....Mr. Wheeler, an Irish land agent, was shot dead near a place called Oola, in the county of Limerick.

THE origin of the disorder in Ballinrobe, Ireland, that culminated in the sending thither of a detachment of Orange volunteers is thus explained in a recent cable dispatch: "The tenants on the estate of Lord Erne became incensed at the harsh treatment of Capt. Boycott, the agent, and refused to pay rents to him. A process-server who was sent round was surrounded, together with his police escort, by a dangerous crowd, and was forced to fly for his life. After three processes had been served and decrees duly obtained against the three persons who were served, a memorial signed by all the tenants was presented to Lord Erne. It recited the griefs against Capt. Boycott, and appealed to the old traditions of the Erne family for considerate landlordism. It intimated that, while the tenants were perfectly willing to pay their rents, they had come to the conclusion never again to work for or hold communication with his present agent. The answer was a firm refusal from Lord Erne to change his agent at their dictation. The tenants asserted their readiness to pay rents to any other person whom his Lordship might appoint. Lord Erne ended the correspondence by a curt note stating that he had no intention whatever of changing his agent, and if they would not pay their rents to Capt. Boycott they might take the consequence. The policy of isolation was then entered upon."

A DUBLIN dispatch of the 16th says: A meeting was held at Kockanrose Village, near Walshtown, yesterday, for the purpose of formally "Boycotting" thirteen landlords, land agents, and others, residing in that neighborhood. Five thousand people were present. James Malloy, a tenant-farmer, was President. The following resolution was adopted: "That we pledge ourselves to 'Boycott' these thirteen men and all who act like them, and will endeavor to follow the example set to the rest of Ireland by the brave men of Ballinrobe." A dispatch from Ballinrobe says: "The general opinion is that it will be absolutely necessary for Boycott to leave the country, as he will have to be protected if he remains in Ireland."

WHILE Spain is about to proclaim the complete pacification of Cuba, the police of Madrid have seized a revolutionary printing establishment and arrested Gen. Ripoll.... Fresh earthquake shocks have occurred at Agram, Austria; two mud volcanoes have formed, and several hot springs have arisen. Half the town has been destroyed, and the sufferers have taken to sheds.... The bodies of 2,000 victims of the recent Kurdish massacre lie unburied in the vicinity of So Uj Bolak.

THE Basutos have achieved another victory over the colonial troops in South Africa. ....The Roman Chamber of Deputies has refused to accept the resignation of Garibaldi and his son, and has granted them three months' leave of absence....The horrors of the Chilian-Peruvian war have been added to by a band of Chinese scoundrels, who follow the Chilian army and complete the work of plunder, and rapine, and murder of the Chilian force.... The British Cabinet is considering two plans for the settlement of the land question. One is, arbitration between landlord and lessee; the other, to aid the tenant to purchase by state loans. A London dispatch of the 18th says the County Cork Land League urges tenant farmers to poison all game covers. Reinforcements of 100 men have been forwarded to Boycott's house, and troops have occupied Headfort, four miles distant. An extra regiment of cavalry will be retained in Ireland during the winter months....An attempt by French Jesuits to find an asylum in Portugal is met by an order for the strict enforcement of the decree of 1834 abolishing religious orders. French monks who landed at Alicante and Barcelona, Spain, were compelled by the populace to re-embark.... The French journals are being sharply disciplined under the republic. The manager of a Toulouse newspaper has been condemned to pay 12,000 francs to the Minister of the Interior, and 6,000 francs to the local Prefect of Police, as damages for libeling those officials.... The sculling match on the river Thames for the championship of the world, between Hanlan, of Canada, and Trickett, of Australia, resulted in an easy victory for the Canadian. He took the lead at the outset, and maintained it throughout, several times stopping and lying down in the boat to allow Trickett to come up. ....The Czar has commuted to life imprisonment the sentences of death pronounced against three Nihilists.

A LONDON dispatch says that Gladstone and Earl Cowper, the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, receive threatening letters daily. Mr. Forster says that land legislation is imperative if the English position in Ireland is to be maintained. John Bright said, in a speech at Birmingham, that the situation in Ireland is due to the landlords' oppression and absenteeism, and the difficulty of tenants obtaining land personally. He attributed the present disturbed state of affairs also to the rejection of the Compensation-for-disturbance bill in the House of Lords. In the future force could effect nothing. Mr. Bright said he was in favor of a plan which should give the tenants security in the possession of their farms and protection against constant increase of rent....A Brussels dispatch says that 8,000 rifles have been shipped from various Italian ports to Ireland....Two condemned Nihilists were hanged at St. Petersburg on the 16th inst. They met their fate without flinching.

CABLE dispatches state that John Bright's forecast of the Government's action on the Irish land question has created a great sensation in England, as well as in Ireland. It seems to be accepted as an established fact now that no coercive measures will be taken, but that everything will be done that is reasonable in the direction of reform and pacification. Gladstone is fully determined to correct the evils of the Irish landlords, and sink or swim with his measures when they come before Parliament. He is confident the country will sustain him....The owner of an extensive estate in the county of Cork is said to have been shot. The Marquis of Sligo has boxed his valuables, and will make London his residence until the agitation has ceased. Parnell will fortify himself for his trial by a brief rest in France. It is now asserted that Bright and Forster will resign from the Cabinet if coercion be used in Ireland, and the Duke of Argyle and the Marquis of Hartington if a weak course be taken.... French editors are being further disciplined by the republic. One has been sentenced to three months' imprisonment and fined 2,000 francs for insulting President Grevy. Another, for defending Communist crimes, received fifteen months....The Turks are fortifying the Thessalian frontier, and have issued a call for 40,000 recruits to strengthen the garrisons in the forts near Greece and Roumania.

A GREAT battle has taken place at Urumiah, the loss being heavy on both sides. The Kurds were repulsed, but burned the village and massacred 200 citizens....A British regiment at Halifax has received orders to sail for Ireland....The burning of a sugar refinery at Etienne, France, wiped out 1,000,000 francs.

A Two-Headed Girl.

There is at Soorabaya, Java, at present on view a Japanese infant with two heads and necks, but with one body, two arms and two legs. The little thing is now about fifty days old, according to the mother, and is so far in fair health. The two heads and necks are placed side by side on the trunk, and are perfectly and neatly formed, and of about normal size. Between them on the trunk is a small protuberance, caused evidently by the junction of two bodies. The body is abnormally broad at the shoulders, and tapers down at the waist and loins to the size of an ordinary infant of the same age; the legs appeared very small and weak, however. The arms on each side of the small chest looked puny. The right hand head is a little lighter in color than the other. How the internal arrangements are disposed of we, of course, do not know, but both heads have to be fed at meal times. When the writer was present one head cried, the mother said from hunger, but the other did not, though it at the same time began moving about restlessly as if for food. The two heads do not breathe alike, nor do the pulses on either arm beat together, from time to time the infant (or infants, for each head has a name) suffers from depression, and the face turns bluish, showing that the blood circulation is not properly regulated. The parents are ordinary Japanese of the lower class, and the mother is good-looking; so is the offspring. They are doing a good trade by the exhibition.—London Telegraph.

Domesticated Animals.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 17.

The Agricultural Department has prepared a statement giving the number of domesticated animals in the United States and Europe. By the table it is shown that there are in Europe 31,573,663 horses, of which Great Britain possesses 2,101,000; Russia, 16,160,000; Austria, 3,367,023; Hungary, 1,158,819; Prussia, 2,278,724; France, 2,742,708; other countries, less than 1,000,000. The United States has but 10,938,700, or 20,643,963 less than Europe.

Europe has 4,163,031 mules and asses, Spain having 2,319,846; Italy, 718,222; France, 706,943; Portugal, 188,610; other countries less than 100,000 each. The United States has but 1,718,100, or 2,442,913 less than all Europe.

There are in Europe 89,678,248 horned cattle, Great Britain having 6,002,100; Ireland, 4,142,400; Sweden, 2,026,839; Russia, 22,770,000; Austria, 7,425,212; Hungary, 5,279,193; Prussia, 8,622,150; Bavaria, 3,068,263; France, 11,721,459; Spain, 2,967,303; Italy, 3,489,125; other countries, less than 2,000,000 each. Burning of the Minnesota Insane Asylum.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Nov. 18.

The number of lives lost by the burning and freezing in the insane asylum is variously estimated at from twelve to fifteen. The loss on building is $300,000. The scenes at the burning of the south wing of the hospital were heartrending in the extreme. So appalling a sight has rarely been witnessed. The patients in the annex were males. Many of them refused to leave the building at all. They ran up and down the halls, screaming and crying, and acting like the bedlamites they were. Of course, those who could not be coaxed nor forced out of the building became the unhappy victims of the flames, and suffered a horrible death in the flames. Others were saved, some by ladders, and some by leaping from the windows. Some were nearly nude, some shoeless and hatless, and all were exposed to the exceeding cold of the night. Many of the poor, demented lunatics fled as if for their lives, and could not be overtaken. Their sufferings in this frightful condition can better be imagined than described. The whole catastrophe is a fearful one to contemplate and an impossible one to describe. The poor dazed inmates of the asylum who had escaped the flames were at large, half clothed, and were to be seen in all directions flying in wild fright from those who attempted to save them. The air was bitter cold, and the poor wretches, with half-naked bodies and bleeding feet, were flying about, hiding in alleys and dark corners. It was a sight once seen never to be forgotten. For some time the capacity of the building has been taxed to its utmost. There were about 800 patients, and every inch of space was utilized. What will be done with these poor creatures turned out in the cold, and their malady increased by the excitement of the occasion, is a serious question. There are three other buildings situated in the town which are used, but they are already crowded to their full capacity. The asylum at Rochester is full, and will doubtless be unable to provide accommodations for any of the inmates at St. Peter turned out in the cold by the terrible catastrophe.

While the flames were slowly progressing the Matron of the Female Department made all haste to get the inmates out, and many of them ran shrieking in their night clothes in the snow drifts, even burying themselves in the snow, and had to be dragged into the barns and sheds, while those near by wrapped blankets and shawls around them. Intense suffering could not be avoided, as they had to be taken about fifteen or twenty rods through the snow to the nearest shelter, which was on the hill immediately in rear of the south wing. Yet when one turns to the main apartments his blood runs cold as he realizes what was the doom of more than one poor demented man last night. Those crowded into the long corridors of the south wing stood around moaning and shivering like poor dumb brutes. The actual number burned cannot be gotten at in any way at the present time, as many are known to have wandered away in the intense excitement that prevailed throughout the whole premises. Several bodies were taken out of some of the rooms and halls, and several persons were gotten out into the halls, when they would seem determined to return to the fire, like a horse that is being led from the flames. One room occupied by two was broken open, and while one was dragged out the other was determined to remain in his warm bed, and, when dragged out, insisted on waiting to be dressed. An old man brought here from Minneapolis, by the name of Adams, was taken out dead. The engine telegraphed for from St. Paul did not arrive in time to do any good. There were about 600 patients in all at the asylum. The principal cause of delay in getting a stream of water on the fire from the hospital hose was the almost utter uselessness of the hose, from the fact that it had not been in use for so long that it required to be wet from end to end with hot water poured on outside of the hose. Meantime the flames spread very rapidly from the basement, filling the halls with smoke and making it impossible to do anything at saving the inmates of the north wing except by putting up ladders and prying off the fire-screens from windows, the rescuers taking inmates out and actually bringing them down in their arms, without clothing in many cases, while at other windows there were three or four begging to be saved from death while the flames were leaping from the adjoining windows at them.

ST. PETER, MINN., Nov. 18.

A rigid investigation of whatever records of the institution were not destroyed by the fire, and a personal identification of those patients who have been secured, show that at least thirty patients are missing. All these are not believed to have perished, as only eight dead bodies have been recovered thus far. Many of the missing ones may be wandering around the country or hiding in the woods. It is feared that some have been frozen to death.

No More Cannibalism.

D. W. De Volaux, the newly appointed Governor of the Cannibal Islands, says in an interview recently published:

"Cannibalism is a thing of the past. No more of it is ever seen or will be heard of again. The natives have become Christians through the agency of the Wesleyan Churches and of Roman Catholic missionaries. In 1876 there were some ten thousand cannibals who resided in the mountainous interior of the Viti Levu. They committed serious outrages upon the coast natives, but ultimately they were subdued by the other natives, and to-day all of them are as peaceable and as loyal as one could wish them to be. The ex-King, Cakobau, recently, in a speech addressed at a meeting of the various chiefs, gave his opinion that the natives had never been so well off as they now are under British protection. Two of his sons are sub-Governors of different Provinces, and exercise great influence over the chiefs and natives, as did the ex-King.

Orthographical.

"Mr. Thompson presents his compliments to Mr. Simpson, and begs to request that he will keep his piggs from trespassing on his grounds."

"Mr. Simpson presents his compliments to Mr. Thompson, and begs to suggest that in future he will not spell pigs with two gees."

"Mr. Thompson's respects to Mr. Simpson, and will feel obliged if he will add the letter E to the last word in the note just received, so as to represent Mr. Simpson and lady."

"Mr. Simpson returns Mr. Thompson's letter unopened, the impertinence it contains being only equaled by its vulgarity."

Cookingin Germany.

The fundamental principle of German cookery is to mix together as many incongruous things as possible. My countrymen have a special talent, recognized the world over, for inventing mixed drinks, but his combinations pale before those of the Germans in mixed cooking. That compound which is so toothsome to a German, a herring salad, is concocted from sixteen different articles. A German beefsteak is made of hashed meats, rolled into a ball and fried. What they call roast beef is a chunk of meat boiled a while and then baked; it usually looks like a lump of India rubber. With the meats is always served a compote, made of stewed or preserved fruit. The vegetables are deemed at their best when they are floating in grease. Sausage, however, is the great national delicacy. It is produced in great varieties of size and quality, and the sausage shops of Berlin are the most elegant in the city.—The Confectioner.

Army Reports.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 16, 1880.

The annual reports of Gens. Pope and Ord have been made public.

Gen. Pope, commanding the Department of the Missouri, gives a detailed history of the troubles with the Indians in Colorado and New Mexico, which, he states, have not yet been wholly settled. Of the situation in the country, Gen. Pope says: "With the present military arrangements and provisions of the agreement with the Utes, there will certainly be no trouble this winter."

He attributes the outbreak of Victoria to the determined purpose of the Interior Department to effect the removal of his band to the San Carlos Agency, Arizona, and says: "I do not know the reasons of the Interior Department for insisting upon the removal; but certainly they should be cogent to justify the great trouble and severe losses occasioned by the attempt to coerce the removal."

One serious trouble with the Indians has always been in relation to their food, and Gen. Pope recommends to the Secretary of the Interior that he forbid Indian Agents to punish or seek to control the actions of Indians by withholding provisions from them.

In relation to the attempt of Capt. Payne to colonize in the Indian Territory, Gen. Pope says: "It is certain Capt. Payne and his followers fully believe in their right to make such settlement in the Oklahoma District, and are anxious to test the question in the United States courts."

Gen. Ord, commanding the Department of Texas, reports nine men killed, two wounded, and one captured by the Indians, since Oct. 1, 1879. The casualties are three less than the previous year. He reports that the number of desertions has increased. The General recommends that a strong force be maintained on the Rio Grande to preserve order.

Gen. McCook recommends that a law be passed by Congress authorizing the enlistment into the army of 150 competent young men (one for each military post), to be rated as schoolmasters, with the rank and pay of commissary sergeant.

GEN. SHERMAN'S REPORT.

Gen. W. T. Sherman, in his annual report to the Secretary of War, recommends, among other things, that the army be increased to 30,000 enlisted men, and says that he agrees with Gen. Sheridan in saying that the present army is overworked; he favors providing suitable armaments for the forts which guard the chief harbors of the country, and thinks that in view of the extension of railroads in the Western States and Territories, particularly the completion of the Pacific roads, many of the minor posts in these regions might be abandoned, and recommends that the soldiers be concentrated at strategic points along the national frontier, and at points where railroads intersect, so that they could be moved to threatened points at the shortest notice. He recommends the abandonment of small seacoast forts, and the establishment of strong garrisons at Portland, Boston, Newport, New York, Port Royal, Key West, San Diego, San Francisco, Port Townsend, Philadelphia, Hampton Roads and Pensacola. Gen. Sherman has a good word to say for the Military School at West Point, and the Artillery School at Fortress Monroe. He holds that the investigation of the Whittaker case fully vindicated the authorities at the former place.

QUARTERMASTER GEN. MEIGS' REPORT.

Quartermaster Gen. Meigs, in his annual report, gives the total earnings, on account of military transportation of the bonded Pacific railroads as follows: Union Pacific, $6,959,974; Central Pacific, $1,321,276; Kansas Pacific, $2,287,832; Sioux City and Pacific, $34,389. The debt of the United States to land-grant railroads on account of the War Department is increasing. A general order of the War Department is being printed, regulating the business of military transportation over land-grant and bonded railroads, and the adjustment of accounts therefor in conformity with the latest legislation, decisions of courts and opinions of the Department of Justice. The cost of wagon and stage transportation of military supplies for the year was $86,163.65, and the cost of water transportation $100,874.69. The debt due June 30, 1880, by railroads which at the close of the war purchased railroad material from the United States, was $1,068,911.72.

SURGEON GEN. BARNES' REPORT.

Surgeon Gen. Barnes in his annual report thinks an appropriation of $250,000 will be required for the use of the medical department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, for the purchase of medical and hospital supplies, for the expenses of purveying depots, for pay of employes, for pay of private physicians and nurses employed in emergencies at posts or stations, and for other miscellaneous expenses of the medical department. Gen. Barnes earnestly recommends an appropriation for a new fire-proof building, adequate for use of a medical museum and library. The cost of such building he estimates at $250,000.

A CALF in Holt county, Mo., got entangled in a pile of rails, and remained in that condition for a period of forty-one days, without food or water. It came out all right.

A PHILADELPHIA girl got $1,000 as balm for a broken heart in a breach of promise case. She asked for $25,000.

AUBURN COURIER.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 25, 1880.

GEN. GARFIELD is a base-ball enthusiast, and never misses a game when in Washington.

HANCOCK has two gold-headed canes, a pair of spurs, a fine autograph collection, and a gorgeous bed-quilt ahead, anyhow.

WASHINGTON was the father of his country and Vanderbilt is its uncle. At least he has loaned money to it and has got its bonds for a goodly portion of all it has borrowed.

WHOLE dresses of seal-skin are made for a young English lady of rank who is to spend the winter in Russia. One of the garments is en princesse, lined with brown silk, and trimmed down the front with frogs of brown and amber cord. The train is caught back with cords, and gold and amber and old Flanders point are the ornaments.

IN England several legal actions have been brought by parties who have been obliged to stand in railway cars because there were no vacant seats. The Judge has refused in these cases to allow merely nominal damages, but has held that the plaintiffs are entitled to substantial damages for their deprivation of the accommodation which the defendants had undertaken to provide.

A REPORT comes from England that "Gerald Massey, the poet, has lost his reason and is an occupant of an insane asylum." Mr. Massey has just passed his 52d year, and should be only in his prime. His life has been a hard struggle with poverty, and many disappointments have crowded in upon him. For many years he has been an ardent spiritualist.

DIVORCE in Scotland was several years ago an almost unheard of thing. Public sentiment would not tolerate the presence of a party to a divorce suit, and lawyers who were engaged in them were ostracised as moral lepers. But modern notions prevail, and it isn't looked upon as such an awful thing as it used to be. During the last ten years there have been 472 divorces granted by the Scotch courts, and 252,830 marriages.

THE records of the Labor Bureau of Castle Garden, New York, show that there has been a greater demand for all kinds of labor during the ten months of this year than at any other time since 1868. In the spring and summer the demand for farm hands was greatly in excess of the supply, and all through the year there have been applications for help in nearly every kind of American industry. Emigrants have been sent to flax and woolen mills, to ironworks and mines of all kinds.

GOV. JOHN POPE HENNESSEY, who is said to be the original of Anthony Trollope's Phineas Finn, is making a vigorous effort to suppress slavery in Hong Kong. Through his exertions two Chinamen, who made efforts to sell a woman, were brought before the Chief Justice recently and sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labor, and two others who were trying to sell five boys were sentenced to seven years' imprisonment. Gov. Hennessey has much to contend with in his crusade against slavery, as many of the English residents are interested in the trade, and thwart him by every means in their power. Up to the present, however, he has been aggressive and successful.

THE widow of Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, who fell in the battle of Shiloh, is now living in San Francisco, and she recently gave an interviewer the facts relating to her husband's movements in California prior to his departure for the South. Mrs. Johnston, referring to the campaign story that Gen. Johnston was engaged in a plot to procure the secession of California, said: "It's a pack of lies from beginning to end." She is described as "a woman of high culture, gracious presence and dignified manners. Some twenty years her deceased husband's junior, the frosts of 58 winters have whitened her hair. Time, however, has dealt kindly with her, and few ladies of her age can boast of so much that is attractive and winning in person.

THE latest thing in dances is called the "raquet," and is neither a waltz nor a polka, though the best parts of both are preserved. The music strikes up with a crash, as though a new volcano had broken out, and the girl will cling tightly, as though frightened, if she understands the dance, and the young man will reassure her by a gentle pressure, if he understands the dance or knows anything at all. At the second crash they dodge, as though some one had thrown a blacksmith shop at them, and they start in. They begin by imitating the struggle for life, representing a person who is drowning, but at each crash of the cymbals and bass drum they dodge and scoot to one side, then dart back again, jam each other sideways, and then, as the crashes of music become more terrific and deafening, they try to drive each other through the floor by main strength, get desperate and claw, and tear and pull, and all at once they go raving mad with hydrophobia and delirium tremens and gnash their teeth and rave and suffer the most terrible agony—and it is all over. It is a short dance, as the design is amusement and not murder. But, short as it is, it is said to be very sweet.

CHICAGO leads the way in adopting telephones for general police uses. Experimental telephonic stations have been established at various points in one important district, and relays of mounted officers are kept in waiting at a central station. Reliable citizens are furnished with keys to the telephone boxes nearest their residence. To prevent false alarms the keys are numbered, and cannot be withdrawn from the lock until released by a key carried by the policeman on that beat. When anything goes wrong in a district, the alarm is sent to the central station, and explanations are given through the telephone. In case of serious disturbance a large bell is sounded, and every officer on the post runs to the nearest box to receive orders.

THE Rev. J. Hyatt Smith, the newly-elected Congressman from the Third district in Brooklyn, who defeated S. B. Crittenden, is a popular Baptist preacher, and is pastor of the Lee Avenue Baptist Church in Brooklyn. His church withdrew from the Long Island Baptist Association some years ago, as a result of a controversy over his right to baptize converts by sprinkling as well as by immersion. Mr. Smith is 56 years old, has black hair, dark eyes, a brunette complexion, and a clean-shaved face. He is affable in manner, and is about as good a story-teller as Mr. S. S. Cox. He goes now and then to the theater, and is so much of a mimic that he has long had the reputation of having once been an actor himself. This, however, is not true.

THE railroads, with few exceptions, continue to show a steady increase of business. The New York Commercial Bulletin gives the gross earnings of thirty-three roads for the month of October, showing an increase of 21 per cent. over those of the corresponding month last year, with 3,718 increased mileage. The gain is fairly distributed throughout the list, but is the most marked in the Northwestern, St. Paul, Central Pacific, Wabash, St. Louis and Pacific, Louisville and Nashville, and Houston and Texas. The following comparative table of gross earnings of some of the leading lines for October will be of interest:

A Woman With a Will.

A woman with a will can make her way in the American world. In Ulster county, N. Y., there is a woman of real grit who inherited fourteen years ago a large estate, consisting principally of farming property, heavily encumbered with debt. It was the old homestead, and she could not bear the idea of seeing it pass into the hands of strangers, and was determined that it should not. Although then only 24 years old, and with no more practical knowledge of life than an ordinary country lass, she assumed the charge of the estate, determined to clear it of debt. Having an old mother 62 years old, a half-sister, also helpless from old age, the two orphaned children of a deceased brother, and a brother in the last stages of consumption to provide for, this made her task doubly hard. A little experience taught her that it was impossible to support her large family and keep up the interest arising from the heavy indebtedness of the estate from the resources of the farm, she decided upon school teaching. She was engaged to teach in her own neighborhood at $8 per month, and her salary in a short time was raised to $40 per month. She has continued school teaching ever since, directing the work of her farm, and during the summer vacations going into the harvest field with the farm hands to pitch on hay, rake, bind, etc. She has earned from teaching school over $3,500, paid off the debt of the old homestead, and greatly improved the property. She has been an extensive stock raiser. Her wheat crop averaged last year forty-two bushels to the acre, the largest yield in the county. Some time ago she learned that a brother-in-law living in Pennsylvania was in destitute circumstances. She went to him and found him helpless from an incurable disease, with a family depending upon him. "Ben," she said, "what can I do for you?" "Nothing, Libbie," was the reply. "You have your hands full already. We will have to go to the county house, I suppose." "Never, Ben, as long as I live. Come and enjoy the comforts of the old homestead with me. I will keep you and your family as long as you live." She says she has enough to do now without having to support a husband, too, which she might have to do if she were to marry.—New York Tribune.

FROM $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 worth of birds' nests are yearly imported into Canton, most of them coming from Java. They are very expensive, costing from $30 to 40 per pound. The nests are composed of pure gelatine, secreted by a species of swallow and deposited against a wall.

THE MOREY LETTER.

Address of the National Democratic Committee.

NEW YORK, Nov. 13.

The Executive Committee of the Democratic National Committee held a private meeting last evening, which was not over until nearly midnight. The members present were W. H. Barnum, Frederick O. Prince of Massachusetts, Abram S. Hewitt, William W. Armstrong of Ohio, and William L. Scott of Pennsylvania. Hiram Atkinson, Chairman of the Democratic State Committee of Vermont, acted as proxy for Bradley B. Smalley, of Vermont; Charles J. Canda, Treasurer of the National Committee, as proxy for Alvah W. Sulloway; and William C. Whitney, Corporation Counsel of this city, as proxy for Outerbridge Horsey, of Maryland. Barnum presided. The committee issued the following address:

In response to inquiries the National Democratic Committee makes the following statement in reference to the so-called Morey letter:

1. Neither the committee nor any sub-committee thereof has ever taken any action in reference to the letter.

2. It was first called to the attention of the Chairman of the committee on the night before its publication in Truth on the 20th of October.

3. The Chairman thereupon requested Mr. Smalley, a member of the committee, to examine the letter, but permission to do so was refused at the office of the Truth.

4. No member of the committee ever saw the letter or any copy or portion thereof until after its publication, or was in any wise concerned therein, or gave any advice in reference thereto.

5. Hart, publisher of Truth, brought the original letter to headquarters, No. 138 Fifth avenue, on the afternoon of the 20th of October, where it was seen for the first time by any member of the committee and other persons not members. All those who were familiar with the handwriting of Gen. Garfield came to the conclusion that the letter was genuine.

6. The committee decided to purchase a reasonable number of electrotype plates of the fac-simile, which had already been prepared by Truth.

7. No denial having come from Gen. Garfield of the authenticity of the letter, notwithstanding the telegraphic demand of the New York Herald and a very sharp leader in that paper, the committee decided to give out the electrotype plates, which was accordingly done. The propriety of this action was not doubted by the committee, as the letter seemed to be in harmony with Gen. Garfield's views upon the subject, covered by a letter gathered from the public records, of undoubted genuineness.

8. The first complete denial was not published until four days after the original publication in Truth, and to this denial, unsupported by any other evidence, the committee, in view of Gen. Garfield's connection with other scandals, attached no weight.

9. Therefore, when evidence was offered to show that Morey was a real person, and not a myth, the committee called for its production, as they were bound to do, in order to arrive at the truth.

10. If the letter had been forged, or any fraud committed in reference thereto, or any false evidence been given, it has been done without the knowledge, consent, or privity of the committee, or any member thereof.

Finally, the committee approves of all honest measures to punish any and all persons who have committed any violation of law, and have no interest in this matter but to arrive at the very truth of the affair. That there should be doubt as to the authenticity of the letter is largely due to the failure of the prosecution to put Gen. Garfield on the stand. [See eighth paragraph.]

WM. H. BARNUM,
Chairman.

By order of the committee.

FREDERICK O. PRINCE,
Secretary.

A resolution was passed tendering the thanks of the committee to W. H. Barnum, Chairman, to the Advisory Committee, and to the officers of the committee for the efficient and faithful manner in which they performed their respective duties.

HEWITT ON DAVIS.

A Partisan Judge Severely Rebuked.

Hon. Abram S. Hewitt makes reply to the opinion of Judge Davis in the Philp case in so far as it relates to himself. Mr. Hewitt says:

The Judge who sits upon the bench is supposed to know the evidence which has been given by a witness. Certainly he should examine it before he undertakes to make statements as to its nature and to draw conclusions from it. That Judge Davis has not performed this duty the following comparison of his statement with the testimony will serve to prove.

That passage is quoted from the opinion in which it is made to appear that the Morey letter was not published until after Mr. Hart had it examined by Hewitt. Mr. Hewitt makes this rejoinder:

Now the simple and unanswerable reply to all this statement and the extraordinary comments in which Judge Davis has seen fit to indulge is that the letter had already been published in Truth before I had ever seen Mr. Hart or the original letter or any copy of it. This fact Judge Davis must have known when he penned the above lines, because I had sworn in his presence and after cross-examination by Mr. Stoughton, in which Mr. Bliss intervened to verify the dates, that the interview with Mr. Hart and the examination of the letter took place on the 20th of October, after its publication in Truth, and not before. I do not know whether Mr. Hart made a mistake in his testimony as to date, but, if he did, there is no possible justification for Judge Davis to base a statement on this mistake in order to attack from the bench the character of a citizen after the date had been fixed beyond possibility of all controversy. While writing this statement I sent a messenger to Mr. Hart to ascertain whether he had ever made any declaration at variance with the facts as I have stated them. Mr. Hart replied that he never said, testified or thought that Mr. Hewitt or any one connected with the National Committee saw the letter in advance of publication of the text of the letter in Truth, on the 20th of October. I never pronounced the body and signature of the letter to be in the handwriting of Gen. Garfield. On the contrary, in the presence of Mr. Hart and all the gentlemen present, I declared the body of the letter not to be in the handwriting of Gen. Garfield, but that I believed the signature to be his autograph. As to the second interview in the evening, it took place after my speech at Chickering Hall, when I was exhausted, and took no other part in the discussion but to reaffirm my belief in the genuineness of the signature. I did not tell Mr. Hart that I would have made it a forgery if I could, nor has he or any one else testified that I ever used the expression.

To Judge Davis' assertion that Hewitt "went on with his associates, scattering the forgery broadcast throughout the country," Mr. Hewitt replies:

So far as I am concerned it would perhaps be sufficient answer to say that I never circulated any lithographs or fac-similes of either kind, but in order to show with what reckless eagerness the charge is made I state that I am assured by a person who did send out fac-similes that only the first or accurate ones were circulated, and that the second or amended fac-similes were only published in Truth, over which it is not pretended the committee had any control. I forbear to make any commentary whatever upon the extraordinary character of the opinion produced by Judge Davis. It is enough for me to point out that the foundation upon which he has built up the attack upon my character is false in fact, and with his demonstration the consequences can only be damaging to himself. I was prepared for this attack by the evidently prearranged preliminary statement of Mr. Stoughton, in the Times of yesterday, and I am now forced to believe that there is a concerted scheme to attempt to break me down in this community, where I have lived for fifty years, and to which I can more safely trust for a just judgment that to a Judge of a Supreme Court who forgets that, when he becomes a Judge, he should cease to be a partisan.

The New York Frauds.

At a meeting of prominent Democrats in New York to take action in the frauds at the recent election, it was resolved to appoint committees as follows: On frauds and coercion, to receive and act upon information in regard to frauds and coercion perpetrated in that city by Republicans, the committee to investigate not more than twelve election districts, in order to thoroughly prepare a case for consideration by Congress, and that they include in the investigation the persecution of colored Democrats by colored Republicans; a committee on Federal intimidation, to investigate the doings of Davenport and his men; and a committee on the prevention of frauds in future.

INDIANA NEWS.

JOHN FISHER, an old Quaker gentleman, voted in Union at his seventeenth Presidential election.

THE receipt of lumber in New Albany from the northern pineries was never heavier than during the present season.

THE German Count Frantz Wilhelm Ferdinand von Wekler, who stole several saws at Fort Wayne, has been sentenced to the penitentiary for one year.

HARRY YOST and Buddy Collins, boys of 14 years of age, residing at Mitchell, had a quarrel over an apple, which resulted in Yost stabbing Collins twice in the abdomen and once in the back.

THE November term of the State Supreme Court begins the fourth Monday of the month, when a new Chief Justice will be elected. The newly-elected Judges will not take their seats until January.

THE wife of Captain John A. Meek, of Galesburg, ex-Sheriff, presented him with triplets on the evening of the election. The two boys he has named Garfield and Arthur, respectively, and the girl he has named America.

EPIZOOTIC has assumed a very virulent type in New Albany. Three horses died of the disease in one day, and many teamsters were compelled to suspend business. The street-car company reduced the trips made one-half.

THE establishment of the free postal delivery in Richmond is a fixed fact, the Postoffice Department having sent a special agent to examine the claims for one and received a satisfactory report. The service will go into operation on the 1st day of January.

THE building, at an early day, of the long-ago proposed Evansville, Seymour and Lake Erie railroad, which is to traverse the counties of Vanderburgh, Warrick, Dubois, Orange, Washington, Jackson, Decatur, Franklin and Union, is likely soon to be consummated.

THE tax-levy in aid of the Local-Trade railroad for this year, in Perry county, is $11,476. The people of Cannelton, Tell City and Troy expect to hear the toot of the locomotive next year. The road is now completed from Gentryville, Spencer county, to Evansville.

A TELEPHONE exchange for Union City was organized last week, by the election of a board of six directors. The capital stock is $3,000, divided into thirty shares. Fifty instruments are taken, and lines will be put up, and the exchange established in working order inside of thirty days.

MISS ANNA HOFFMAN, of New Albany, who lost both her arms by being run over by an engine on the Jeffersonville, Madison and Indianapolis railroad, sued the Pennsylvania Company, lessee of the road, by her father, for $100,000 damages. The case has been compromised, the company, it is said, paying Miss Hoffman $11,000.

HERMAN ENGLER, of Fort Wayne, and a comrade were out hunting in a spring wagon, and while getting out the trigger of the gun caught, shooting both of them. The ball lodged in Engler's right arm, severing the main artery. He lost so much blood before his companion could get him home that he died soon after. His companion was not seriously injured.

THE fire which destroyed the Bloomingdale Brewery, near Fort Wayne, was the work of an incendiary. Several hogsheads had been filled with kerosene oil and fired. A bucket used at the brewery was found half full of the combustible liquid. A pair of pants, saturated with oil, but which were not burned, may possibly lead to the discovery of the guilty wretch.

A DUEL with pistols at Madison, the other night, growing out of political animosity, had a tragic termination. There was a great deal of yelling on the streets by young men who were excited over the election. There were shouts for Garfield, for Hancock, and for Jeff Davis. The shouts for Jeff Davis came several times from a crowd of six or eight young fellows one door below George Glass' saloon. Capt. Fred Trenck, near by, was heard to remark that no one could halloo for Jeff Davis in his presence, and started over for the crowd, followed or accompanied by George Watson. Trenck said, "I want to find the traitor who yelled for Jeff Davis." In response to this remark, Glass, who was nearly face to face with Trenck, struck Trenck with his fist on the right cheek bone. Then followed an interchange of seven shots between Glass and Watson, both men standing up bravely to the fierce work. During the firing the crowd dispersed and sought safe quarters. When the last shot was fired, Watson retreated across Mulberry street to Hargin's corner, and Glass started back into his saloon. As he entered the door he was about to fall, when he was caught and laid on a table nearest the door, where the wounded man died with a few gasps, uttering the words, "I am shot." The ball passed through his lungs and heart. Watson was severely wounded in the leg.

School Superintendent's Report.

James H. Smart, State Superintendent of Public Instruction, has made up his annual report, the statistics of which are given below:

From the reports of the county superintendents on enumeration it appears that there are 703,558 children of school age (between 6 and 21 years) in the State, of which 364,761 are white males, 334,249 white females, 7,162 colored males, and 7,386 colored females. Between the ages of 10 and 21 there are in the State 1,090 males and 957 females who can neither read or write. The children attending school during the past year numbered 511,283, namely, 265,872 males, 237,395 females, and 8,016 colored. The daily attendance was 321,-659, and schools have been taught in 9,333 out of a total of 9,425. The colored schools numbered 104, the graded schools 339, the township graded schools 163, and the average length of school term within the year was 136 days. In the work of teaching there were employed 13,578 persons, of whom 7,731 were white male teachers, 5,732 white females, and 115 colored. The table showing the compensation of teachers is interesting, as it shows that there is a wide margin between the payments for the same description of service in the several counties. For instance: In townships the per diem for male teachers varies from $1.35 in Newton to $2.29 in Vanderburg, and for females from 93 cents in DeKalb to $2.23 in Vanderburg. In town schools male teachers are paid for their daily service all the way from $1.76 in Howard to $5.83 in Lawrence, and female teachers from 75 cents in Fayette to $2.33 in Parke county. In city schools the payment of male teachers ranged from $2 in Posey to $7.50 in Knox, and of female teachers from $1.65 in Posey to $5 in Floyd.

There are in the State 9,647 school-houses, of which 85 are built of stone, 2,189 of brick, 7,-288 are frame, while 75 of the original log school-houses still remain in the service. During the year 359 new school-houses have been erected, and these are valued at $410,972.86, while the total valuation of school property, including buildings, apparatus, etc., is $11,817,-964.53.

Township Trustees were paid during the year for managing educational matters, $77,-721.93. The township libraries contain 241,824 books, and 3,774 have been added during the year.

The State account of revenue for tuition stands as follows:

On hand Sept. 1, 1879	$1,928,133.62

The Health of Animals.

Early last spring we published in the Health Monthly an article from the pen of Hubert T. Foote, D. V. S., on the care of animals, in which he took the position that horses and cattle should have shelter that is as well provided with cleanliness and ventilation as are our homes. The writer undertook to show that horses are subject to pretty much the same ills that we are, and that they are nearly or quite as sensitive to all injurious influences. Since the new disease has broken out among the horses of our cities, some of our metropolitan papers have been calling attention to the same subject which was so well presented by the veterinarian, Dr. Foote. The ground taken is that if we would have healthy horses and cattle we must give them carefully prepared stables and sheds which are free from all disagreeable odors or poisons or malarious influences. Further attention is called to the fact that cows provide a large share of the food which is given to our children, and yet that these useful animals are often provided with only filthy abodes. Considering how frequently our horses are affected by some new epidemic and how rapidly pleuro pneumonia is extending over the country would it not be well for all who have the care of such domestic animals to look well to their creature comforts, and see to it that their dwelling-places are as well ventilated and cared for as are our dwellings.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

"WILL you and your son occupy one room?" asked a hotel clerk of a woman of 35, who arrived at Omaha with a boy of 16. "This is not my son," she said with emphasis, "but my husband. We are on our bridal tour."

Innocent Childhood.

[Bill Nye, in Denver Tribune.]

Childhood is the glad springtime of life. It is then the seeds of future greatness or startling mediocrity are sown.

If a boy has marked out a glowing future as an intellectual giant, it is during these early years of his growth that he gets some pine knots to burn in the evening, whereby he can read Herbert Spencer and the Greek grammar, so that when he is in good society he can say things that nobody can understand. This gives him an air of mysterious greatness which soaks into those with whom he comes in contact, and makes them respectful and unhappy while in his presence.

Boys who intend to be railroad men should early begin to look about them for some desirable method of expunging two or three fingers and one thumb. Most boys can do this without difficulty. Trying to pitch a card out of a job press, when it is in operation, is a good way. Most job presses feel gloomy and unhappy until they have eaten the fingers off of two or three boys. Then they go on with their work cheerfully and even hilariously.

Boys who intend to lead an irreproachable life, and be foremost in every good work, should take unusual precaution to secure perfect health and longevity. Good boys never know when they are safe. Statistics show that the ratio of good boys who die, compared to bad ones, is simply appalling.

There are only thirty-nine good boys left as we go to press, and they are not feeling well themselves.

The bad ones are all alive and very active.

The boy who stole my coal-shovel last spring, and went out into the graveyard and dug into a grave to find Easter eggs, is the picture of health. He ought to live a long time yet, for he is in a very poor shape to be ushered in before the bar of judgment.

When I was a child I was different from other boys in many respects, I was always looking about to see what good I could do. I am that way yet.

If my little brother wanted to go in swimming, contrary to order, I was not strong enough to prevent him, but I would go in with him and save him from a watery grave. I went in the water thousands of times that way, and as a result, he is alive to day.

But he is ungrateful. He hardly ever mentions it now, but he remembers the gordian knots that I tied in his shirts. He speaks of them frequently. This shows the ingratitude and natural depravity of the human heart.

Ah, what recompense have wealth and positions for the unalloyed joys of childhood, and how gladly to-day as I sit in the midst of my oriental splendor and castle magnificence and thoughtfully run my fingers through my infrequent bangs, would I give it all, wealth, position and fame, for one balmy breezy day gathered from the mellow haze of the long ago, when I stood knee-deep in the luke-warm pool near my suburban home in the quiet dell, and allowed the yielding and smoothing mud and meek-eyed pollowogs to squirt up between my dimpled toes.

Preaching to the Insane.

[St. Albans (Vt.) Messenger.]

A good story was recently told by a Brattleboro clergyman who had been in the habit of preaching Sunday afternoons to the inmates of the asylum for the insane. The clergymen in that village take turns in this work, and one afternoon one of them preached about the alabaster box of precious ointment, which was poured upon the Master's feet. As he came out of the chapel, one of the patients came to him and said:

"You have got us pretty well anointed now," and in explanation added that for two preceeding Sundays different clergymen had preached on the same subject.

This story reminds us of another, as good a one, told of a clergyman in Jacksonville, Ill. This minister was out of a field, and, hearing that there was no preaching in the asylum in that city, sought the opportunity to dispense the gospel there. At his first service he was very much gratified to observe the close attention that one of the patients gave to his sermon, and he went away and told some of his friends that he had found a very hopeful field of labor in the asylum which had been neglected too long. The next Sunday he noticed the same intent expression on the face of this hopeful listener and thought the man would soon be converted. Again the next Sunday the same man gave eager attention, convincing the clergyman that he was not far from the Kingdom of Heaven. In the sermon the old story had been related about Hindoo women casting their children into the Ganges. The minister sought an opportunity at the close of service for a personal conversation with his eager listener. The patient grasped his hand warmly and said:

"I couldn't help thinking, while you were telling that story, that it was a great pity your mother didn't chuck you into the river when you were a baby."

Hibernation.

The sleep of winter and that of night are different in those animals which are torpid for months. The bat, the hedgehog, tawrie, the marmot, the hamster, the tortoise, the toad, snakes, mollusca, spiders, bees, flies, bears, badgers, etc., retire to their closed holes, and, in various degrees, undergo a temporary death for four, five, six and seven months of the year. They usually roll themselves up, but bats suspend themselves in caves. Those that lay up provisions use them before they become torpid, and on reviving before they venture abroad. Their temperature lowers, their respiration is less frequent, and at intervals the circulation is reduced, they lose their feeling, the digestive organs are inactive and they suffer loss of weight. The confined air in which they shut themselves, added to the cold, is the cause of their torpidity. Facts lead to the belief that some birds hibernate.

"We Never Advertise."

In a recent issue of the New York shipping list we find the following on the merchants who never advertise: "There is a class of business men, or rather men in business—for there is a distinction with a difference—who persistently refuse to advertise in a paper. When such people are approached for an advertisement, which may return its cost a hundred fold, they have a stereotyped reply, 'We never advertise; our business is large enough, and we don't care about extending it.' And yet these very same men, whenever their interests are threatened or attacked by injurious legislation, are foremost in soliciting the aid of the press, and imploring its influence in defeating the obnoxious measures. It never, possibly, occurs to them that the influence which can avert or change legislation is not less powerful in directing the currents of the trade to those houses most deserving of it by their superior enterprise, intelligence and liberty."

American Horses in France.

Some two years ago Col. John A. Bridgland, United States consul at Havre, conceived the idea of introducing American horses into the French cavalry service. With this object in view he has, during that time, imported about one hundred and sixty American horses, nearly all of which have gone into the cavalry service. By this means the attention of the French government has been called to the fact that a decidedly better grade of horse can be procured in the United States and taken to France for less than they pay for the inferior horse they now use. The result is that two officers of the French army have been sent to this country on a special tour of observation with reference to this subject. Lieutenant-Colonel Baron Favert de Kerbach, first regiment chasseurs d'Afrique, and Captain Henry de Lalhere, thirteenth dragoons, are now in the United States for the purpose indicated. Col. Bridgland met them by appointment a few day ago at Cincinnati, and gave them much valuable information concerning American horses and the best mode of buying and shipping them.

SEASONED WITH ARSENIC.

Sad Mistake at a Tennessee Wedding Feast—Six of the Guests Already Dead, and Several Others Fatally Poisoned.

A special to the Cincinnati Enquirer, of November 28, says news has been received of the poisoning of a wedding party in Boon county, Tennessee, adjacent to Hamilton county, resulting in the death of six and the probable death of three others. Joel Hendree and Jane Dale were the contracting parties, and both being members of the most prominent families in that vicinity, a very large number of friends witnessed the nuptials, which were performed at the residence of the bride's father, at a point on Emory river, fifty-six miles above Chatanooga.

After the ceremony the guests, numbering about fifty, were invited to the hospitable board of Colonel Dale, and partook of the bountiful repast there served. The evening was spent in various festivities, and at night the guests again were invited to supper. After the evening meal a sudden lethargy seemed to overtake the members of the festive party, and one by one they commenced complaining of dreadful pains. In a short time twenty-seven of the party were unconscious. The greatest excitement prevailed. Colonel Dale's house being too small to accommodate all the invalids for the night, twelve were removed to other houses in the neighborhood.

Forty-eight hours afterward two of the afflicted died—Emma Peters, a grand-daughter of the bride's father, and Mattie Lowry, each aged about eight. The bride's brother, Robert Dale, died a few hours later. The bride's uncle, Mr. Mike May, died the next day; and Albert Gallaher and Mattie Lovelace, two of the guests, died the next day. The bride's father, mother and brother are very low, and will probably die.

The precise cause of the poisoning is yet unknown, but several conjectures are afloat. The most plausible is that arsenic had been put in the edibles as seasoning instead of salt. Colonel Dale had purchased a quantity of arsenic a few days previous for the destruction of crows that were preying upon his wheat-fields. Pending the excitement of the approaching wedding this had been left bundled up in the kitchen. It is supposed that in the hurry the cook opened the bundle containing the poison, and intending to salt the victuals threw in a quantity of arsenic.

A JILTED LOVER'S REVENGE.

Refused by His Sweetheart, He Marries Her Mother, and Turns the Tables.

[From the Alta California.]

An awful case of the consequences of refusing a young man's honorable love is reported on the west side. A really nice young man fell in love with a handsome girl, the only daughter of a handsome, well-preserved widow of thirty-eight, and offered her marriage. She ridiculed him because he was twenty-five, and said he was old enough to be her father, and so on, and with her taunts goaded him to such a pitch of frenzy that he swore he would be fearfully revenged. Accordingly he proposed to and married the wretched girl's mother.

Now that wretched girl has to wear stout leather boots two sizes too large for her, and go to bed at 9 p. m., and eschew the theater, chocolate caramels, ice-cream, and in fact everything else that makes one's life worth living for. Her step-father's nominal object being that when she grows up she may be as splendidly matured woman as her mother, the compliment implied in this inducing the mother to second him enthusiastically.

When a young man comes round to see that wretched girl her step-father bounces him down the front steps, throws his hat after him, and tells the wretched girl that the young man is not a fit companion for her, and that he is as solicitous for her future as he would be for that of his own child, and altogether in the kindest manner possible he make that wretched girl even wish she were dead as many as a hundred times a day.

Let all other beautiful girls who are often tempted to refuse the matrimonial offer of eligible young men be warned by her unhappy fate.

The Minnesota Asylum Fired by One of the Insane Inmates.

A special to the Pioneer Press from St. Peter says: "Ben Hasselman, an inmate of the asylum, arrested yesterday on suspicion of having fired the building, made a confession to-day that he had committed the deed. He says he was badly treated, and tried to burn the building down in revenge. He says he wishes all had been burned. He placed a can of naphtha in the female wing, but it did not ignite when he tried to kindle it. He was considered a mild case, and allowed the run of the building."

TRAVELING FACILITIES.

The Journey between Philadelphia and New York a Century Ago and To-Day.

[Philadelphia Times, Nov. 13, 1880.]

This week two additional fast morning trains have been added to the Pennsylvania railroad company's passenger service between Philadelphia and New York, a train leaving this city at eleven and one leaving New York at eight o'clock, both running through in two hours, the time made by the several other fast trains already on the passenger schedule. These added facilities for travel between the two cities suggest a glance backward at the manner in which the science of transportation has been developed almost within our own time. A little less than a hundred years ago, when "the French packet" left "New York about the 25th, and the British packet on the first Wednesday of every month," the journey between Philadelphia and New York was a pretty serious undertaking. The public prints of the day contained this announcement:

Stages to the eastward set out for New York every morning (Sunday excepted) from Mr. Dennison's, at the George tavern, corner of Second and Arch streets; others return every evening (Sunday excepted.) In summer the stages reach New York in one day, and in two in winter. Two other stages for New York, partly by land and partly by water, leave the Crooked Billet wharf on Wednesday and Sunday mornings, and return generally on Tuesday and Friday evenings. From New York the stages reach Boston in six days.

Great as the change is from these primitive times to our own, we notice it less because it has come so gradually. When the old Camden and Amboy line was open to travel forty years or so ago, the improvement upon the stage coaches which covered the distance in a long day—and this only under favorable circumstances—was very great, but it was not so great as the improvement upon primitive railroading which the Pennsylvania railroad company has effected within the past ten years. Some of us remember, with feelings of misery, the six or eight hours in the wretched little cars and in the slow-going boat that the journey to New York involved. And yet as we journeyed we marveled not a little at what we then regarded as the greatest wonder of the age—a locomotive engine moving at the rate of twelve or fifteen miles an hour. As traveling facilities have increased travel has increased proportionately. These forty trains which play between the two cities every day, carry backward and forward eight thousand or more passengers—more than in olden times made the same journey in a year. Nor is this increase surprising when we reflect that a business man can do a good day's work in either city and still have time on the same day to return across to the other for business or pleasure or both combined; can leave Philadelphia at eleven o'clock, have three hours in New York, and get back to Philadelphia again in time for supper at 6:30.

Solomon and the Blacksmith.

The story goes that during the building of Solomon's temple, that wise ruler decided to treat the artisans employed on his famous edifice to a banquet. While the men were enjoying the good things his bounty had provided, King Solomon moved about from table to table, endeavoring to become better acquainted with his workmen. To one he said:

"My friend, what is your trade?"

"A carpenter."

"And who makes your tools?"

"The blacksmith," replied the carpenter.

To another Solomon said:

"What is your trade?"

"A mason."

"And who makes your tools?"

"The blacksmith," replied the mason.

A third stated that he was a stone-cutter, and that the blacksmith also made his tools. The fourth man that King Solomon addressed was the blacksmith himself. He was a powerful man, with bared arms, on which the muscles stood out in bold relief, seemingly almost as hard as the metal he worked.

"And what is your trade, my good man?" said the king.

"Blacksmith," laconically replied the man of the anvil and sledge.

"And who makes your tools?"

"Make 'em myself," said the blacksmith.

Whereupon King Solomon immediately proclaimed him the king of the mechanics, because he could not only make his own tools, but all other artisans were forced to go to him to have their tools made.

Polk, Calhoun, Buchanan.

[The Atlantic.]

President Polk was nearly fifty years of age when he was inaugurated, and was no novice in public life, having served for fourteen years in congress and for two years as governor of the state of Tennessee. He was a spare man of unpretending appearance and middle stature, with a rather small head, a full, angular brow, penetrating dark grey eyes, and a firm mouth. His hair, which he wore long and brushed behind his ears, was touched with silver when he entered the white house, and grey when he left it. He was a worthy and well qualified member of the fraternity of Free Masons and a believer in the creed of the Methodists, although, out of deference to the religious opinions of his wife, he attended worship with her at the Rev. Mr. Sprole's Presbyterian church. Calm, cold and intrepid in his moral character, he was ignorant of the beauty of moral uprightness in the conduct of public affairs—ambitious of power, and successful in the pursuit of it. He was very methodical and remarkably industrious, always finding time to listen patiently to storries of those who came to him as petitioners of patronage and place. But his arduous labors impaired his health and shortened his life. Before his term of office had expired, his friends were pained to witness his shortened and feebled step, and the air of languor and exhaustion which set upon him.

Mrs. Polk was a strict Presbyterian, and she shunned what she regarded as "the vanities of the world" whenever it was possible for her to do so. She did not possess the queenly grace of Mrs. Madison, or the warm-hearted hospitality of Mrs. Tyler, but she presided over the white house with great dignity. She was of medium height and size, with very black hair, dark eyes and complexion, and formal yet graceful deportment. At the inauguration of her husband she wore a black silk dress, a long black velvet cloak with a deep cape, trimmed with fringe and tassels, and a purple velvet bonnet, trimmed in satin ribbon. She would not permit dancing at the white house, but she did all in her power to make the administration of Mr. Polk popular. One morning a lady found her reading. "I have many books presented to me by the writers," said she, "and I try to read them all; at present this is not possible; but this evening the author of this book dines with the president, and I could not be so unkind as to appear wholly ignorant and unmindful of his gift." At one of her evening receptions a gentleman remarked: "Madam, you have a very genteel assemblage to-night." "Sir," replied Mrs. Polk, with perfect good humor, but very significantly, "I never have seen it otherwise."

John C. Calhoun had expected to remain in the cabinet as secretary of state, and he did not hesitate to say that he was sacrificed to appease the wrath of Mr. Van Buren. Accordingly James Buchanan became Mr. Polk's secretary of State, and Mr. Calhoun soon returned to the capitol as a senator from South Carolina, to engineer the extension of slavery, free trade and state sovereignty. His appearance indicated that he was over threescore years of age. Brushy eyebrows overshaddowed deep blue eyes, which gleamed like stars; his furrowed forehead and gaunt cheeks showed great mental activity and care, and his thin lips had the melancholy look seen in the portraits of Dante. His long, coarse hair had become grey, and he wore it brushed back in masses from his high forehead. One morning as he was sitting for his portrait in the studio of Mr. Kellogg, he said to the writer of these reminiscences: "I have always endeavored to dress with a simplicity that would not attract notice, and I have succeeded, with the exception of my hair. When I wore it short the letter-writers used always to have something to say about it, and now that it is long I fear that it attracts equal attention." Speaking of autographs, he remarked that his original handwriting was round and clear, but that when he was in the Litchfield law-school his haste in taking notes changed it. It was then as erratic and bold as were his movements in the days of nullification.

Mr. Buchanan was then in the prime of life, and his stalwart frame, fair complexion, light blue eyes, courtly manners and scrupulously neat attire prompted an English visitor—Mrs. Maury—to say that he resembled a British nobleman of the past generation, when the grave and dignified bearing of men in power was regarded as an essential attribute to their office. Although a bachelor, he kept house on F street, next to the abode of John Quincy Adams, where his accomplished niece presided at his hospitable board. He faithfully carried out the foreign policy of President Polk, but never let pass an opportunity for advancing his claims to the succession, with refreshing humility. In a heretofore unpublished letter written to a friend he alluded to a prediction that he would be the next president, and went on to say: "I or any other man may disappear from the political arena without producing a ripple upon the surface of the deep and strong current which is sweeping the country to its destiny. Nothing has prevented me from removing myself from the list of future candidates for the presidency except the injury this might do to the democratic cause in Pennsylvania. On this subject I am resolved, and whenever it may be proper, I shall make known my resolution. Nothing on earth could induce me again to accept a cabinet appointment." Yet never did a wily politician more industriously plot and plan to secure a nomination than Mr. Buchanan did in his still hunt for the presidency

The Colored Brother.

The colored United States Senator Bruce, of Mississippi, whose time expires in a short time, demands, through his colored friends, a place in the new cabinet. This, however, will not meet the wants of some of the colored brethren, and they are now demanding positions in every department of the government.

The Advocate, an organ of the colored race, published in Washington City, after alluding to the proposition to place Mr. Bruce in the cabinet, concludes as follows: "We indorse these views, so far as they go; but our idea is, that the appointment of no one single individual to a prominent place is the full measure of the duty toward the negro. General recognition in all the departments of the civil service is what we want—from a place in the cabinet down to clerkships here in Washington, and in postmasterships, collectorships of customs and internal revenue, inspectors of the postal department, special agents of the treasury department throughout the country, etc. The value of the negro vote in such states as Indiana, New York and Ohio, can be properly estimated when it is known that their vote was so large that had it been taken from the republicans and given to the democratic party, the result would have been far different. Hancock, instead of steaming up Salt river on the suspicious craft, solid south—believed to be stolen property—would be steering for the white house. Turning from the presidential to the congressional victory, the importance of the negro voter is more clearly seen. In at least nine of the districts of the south, from which republicans were returned, in all save the one in east Tennessee and Kentucky, the negro voter gave the republican candidates much more than the majorities, and in a majority of these cases four-fifths of the votes cast.

White Hairs.

"Not like snow, nor like anything else in the world," writes the author of "Romola," so she simply calls it "the beautiful white hair of age," and in disdaining all similes in connection with such a subject, we recognize the deep and true perception of George Eliot:

"Your hair has a golden gloss, Jeanette,
'Tis silk of the finest floss, my pet,
'Tis a beautiful twist falling down to your wrist—
A thing to be braided, jeweled and kissed.
'Tis the loveliest hair in the world, my pet."

So sings Charles Halpine, and so in all ages have poets sung of hair that is auburn, raven, brown, of "those wonderful waves of bronze and gold," of all hair, save the sad and simple hair of the age. Ah, yes! men fall into raptures about sunny ringlets of jet-black locks, and their hearts get entangled in the silken meshes, but to the venerable presence of white hairs one is tempted to lift his hat. Some there are who, walking along the pathway of years, have reached in the fulness of time the threshold of eternity, and as they recede further and further from the darkness, perhaps it is simply the reflection of heaven which makes their hair seem white. However that may be, let us learn to love "the beautiful white hair of age."

Jay Gould Buys the New York World

It is stated that Jay Gould has secured a controlling interest in the World, and he will at once endeavor to improve its present condition. An entire new building is projected, to be located on the corner opposite the present quarters. It will have a frontage on Park row of 155 feet, and will extend back to Theatre alley and take in the whole block on Beekman street. This building will not only be occupied by the World, but also by telegraph and other companies.

CHANGING COMPLEXION.

A White Child Suddenly Becomes a Thorough African.

[St. Louis Globe-Democrat.]

For over sixteen months past an uptown physician has been attending a case of disease that is so rare that the like of it has never been known, or, at least, recorded in medical works. It is a case of real melanosis pigmentation, where the pigment or melanin, as it is technically called, which gives color to the hair and eyes, pervades the whole body. A boy born of white parents, and perfectly natural in color at his birth, turned, under the disease, as black as a full-blooded negro. It is certainly one of the most remarkable freaks of nature ever brought to light, and it will attract the attention of the entire medical fraternity of the world.

The parents live in New Jersey; the father, John Shalter, being a mechanic. They were married in December, 1876, the woman at that time twenty years of age, and the husband twenty-eight. They are both of American birth, the wife being of english descent and the husband of Irish extraction. Ten months after the union of the couple there was born to them a fine and apparently healthy boy baby. The infant thrived and promised to develop into a robust boy. He was a beautiful child, with fair complexion, dark eyes, and silky, dark brown hair, which grew in profusion. When two weeks old he was taken to a priest and christened, and all the friends attending that interesting ceremony complimented the happy parents upon the beauty and promise of the youngester. But in a few days the parents were alarmed at a remarkable change that was coming over the child. He gradually grew dark. At first his skin became a pale yellow, then deepened into a saffron hue, and then, to the terror of the parents, grew darker yet. They thought the boy was attacked with jaundice, and turned to the priest for advice. The good father was astonished when told that the dark-skinned boy before him was the beautiful, fair boy he had christened but two weeks before. He saw that the trouble was something worse than jaundice, and advised the afflicted parents to consult a physician at once. This was done, and various doctors prescribed for the child, but the disease was not checked. The child grew darker and darker. The color was uniform all over the body, except at the joints, where it was a little darker, and at the palms of the hands, where it was lighter.

The once fine, brown hair grew stiff and jet black, and the eyes also grew darker, so that the line between the pupils and the iris could not be distinguished. In spite of medical treatment the boy grew worse, and became very weak, all the time the color of his skin deepening. At last he became as black as a full-blooded negro. Then he was attacked by convulsions, which grew more frequent and violent until they threatened the child's life. It was in one of these that Dr. Reynolds was called in. He succeeded in curing the spasms, and then devoted his attention to the strange disease which afflicted the child. He at once recognized it as melanosis or pigmentation, which is mentioned in the books in a general way, but there is no case given where it had developed all through the body. This was over sixteen months ago, the child being three years old. Since that time the boy has greatly improved, by degrees becoming lighter, until he is now of a light chestnut-brown color. The hair has once more become brown and soft, and the eyes are regaining their natural appearance. The parents of the boy are perfectly healthy, and the mother now carries at her breast a robust infant, aged six months. The father is a muscular man of medium height, with black hair and dark complexion. The mother is of fair complexion, and has brown hair.

Since Dr. Reynolds has had the case in charge, the child has been visited by over two hundred physicians, who all agree that it was a truly remarkable case.

WEEKLY NEWS REVIEW.

THE EAST.

The Lotus Club, of New York, gave a brilliant reception in honor of Gen. Grant. Whitelaw Reid presided, and asked why the illustrious guest of the evening should not be made Captain General of the armies. The guest replied that he was entirely satisfied with his present position, and was not one of those who charged republics with ingratitude.

A retired merchant was knocked down in daylight in Broadway, New York, and robbed of a diamond pin worth $1,200, and an aged lady was assaulted in the hall of an apartment-house, and $400 taken from her money-belt.

Graff & Co., at Lancaster, Pa., has been burned, the loss being $60,000....Dr. Buchanan, of bogus medical-certificate notoriety, and Martin V. Chapman, one of his bondsmen, have been convicted at Philadelphia on the charge of conspiring to defraud the Government of $5,000....A fire in the penitentiary at Allegheny City, Pa., on Thanksgiving day, destroyed sixty-five cells.

THE WEST.

The health department of Chicago has been examining the sewerage in houses where deaths had occurred from diphtheria, and find it defective in 70 per cent. of the cases reported.

James D. Williams, Governor of Indiana, died at Indianapolis on the 20th of November. His disease was inflammation of the bladder, with which he had been afflicted for a period of about fifteen years. Gov. Williams was nearly 73 years of age, and had been an active politician since 1843. He was elected for several successive terms to the lower house of the Indiana Legislature, and in 1858 was elected to the State Senate, elected to Congress in 1874, and Governor of Indiana in 1876. He was a homespun sort of man, and was very popular because of his simple ways and sterling integrity. By his death Lieut.-Gov. Gray becomes Governor till the first Tuesday of January next, when he will be succeeded by Governor-elect Porter.

Leavitt's English Opera Burlesque Company hold the boards at Haverly's, in Chicago, the present week. This is an entirely new organization, and is very highly spoken of by the local press. "La Fille du Tambour Major," Offenbach's last production, rendered in English, is the bill for the week. Judging from the names of those connected with the troupe, it must be very fine, both in musical and dramatic strength.

The wholesale drug house of Lord, Stoutenburg & Co., on Wabash avenue, Chicago, has been burned. The loss is estimated at about $190,000....Michael H. Donly, recently a trumpeter in the Fifth cavalry, killed himself in St. Louis, after firing two shots at a disreputable woman to whom he was engaged....The people of Kansas have voted for the adoption of an amendment to the State constitution prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors. The majority for the amendment was 6,547. It is in form much like the Maine liquor law. Dr. Thomas Wood, a prominent surgeon of Cincinnati, has died from the effects of blood-poisoning, caused by attending with chapped hands to a wounded man in a recent railroad accident....A. B. Meacham, the Ute Commissioner, has been arrested by the authorities of Colorado as accessory to the murder of Jackson, the freighter.... The brewery of Sommermeyer & Brother, at Eau Claire, Wis., valued at $25,000, has been destroyed by fire....One of the four buildings belonging to the Methodist College at Adrian, Mich., has been ruined by fire, the loss being $10,000.

Lieut. Gov. Gray has been installed as Governor of Indiana, to fill the vacancy caused by the death of the late Gov. Williams. The funeral services of the latter were participated in at Indianapolis by a vast number of people, including many of the most distinguished citizens of the State. The remains were removed to Wheatland, his old farm house, for interment.

Charles Bochringer and wife, of Napa, Cal., on leaving their home locked their children in the house. Later in the day the parents returned to find the little ones burned to death....The town of St. Pierre, D. T., has been the scene of a pitched fight between vigilants and desperadoes. The latter were finally "cleaned out," their leader being killed and four others wounded....Augustus Wernet, of Canton, Ohio, died of lockjaw, caused by spraining his ankle in jumping out of bed.

Ben Hasselman, an inmate of the Minnesota Insane Asylum, confessed having fired that building, and wishes all had been burned....The prairie region of Minnesota is suffering greatly from a lack of fuel. Telegrams of inquiry sent out by Gov. Pillsbury elicit a hearty condemnation of the railroads traversing the new section.... Two ladies of East Dubuque, Mrs. Fred Chaleau and Miss Amanda Gregoire, were drowned in an air-hole while endeavoring to cross the Mississippi on the ice. Prof. James C. Watson, head of the Astronomical Department of the University of Wisconsin, and previous to his accepting that position Director of the Observatory at Michigan University, is dead. The deceased was in his 42d year, and was one of the ablest astronomers of this country.

A. S. Foote, Brick Pomeroy's late partner in the publication of the La Crosse Democrat, has been sentenced to five years in the Wisconsin penitentiary for forgery....A prospecting party has brought to the Oklahoma headquarters, in Kansas, specimens of gold, silver, copper and lead, alleged to have been found in the Wichita mountains, in the southwestern portion of Indian Territory.

THE SOUTH.

The sugar-crop of Louisiana is estimated at 237,000 hogsheads, an increase of 1,000 hogsheads over that of last year.... Through the carelessness of an engineer, the boiler in a saw and grist mill, near Stevenson, Ala., exploded and caused the instant death of four men, the fatal wounding of two, and the serious wounding of two others.

Passengers in a sleeping-car passing through the Baltimore tunnel were robbed of $7,000 in money and valuables, in the most mysterious manner.

Arsenic, mistaken for soda, caused the death of five guests at a wedding in Tennessee, and the dangerous illness of thirty more....An American soldier was shot by a Mexican in a house of ill-fame at Crockett, Texas. In retaliation, three Mexican houses, including the one in which the soldier was killed, were set on fire.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the New Orleans Pacific railway, in New Orleans, a resolution favoring the consolidation of that road with the Texas Pacific was unanimously adopted. The consolidation of the two roads and the extension of the line will make a continuous road from New Orleans by way of Shreveport, Fort Worth and El Paso to the Pacific coast.... The Election Commissioners of Warren county, Miss., the Chairman of the Democratic Executive Committee of the Sixth Congressional district, and the Chairman of the Executive Committee of Warren county were arrested last week on the order of Judge Hill, of the United States District Court, on the charge of fraud in connection with the recent election.

POLITICAL.

Official vote of Wisconsin: Garfield, Republican, 144,399; Hancock, Democrat, 114,653; Weaver, Greenback, 7,782; Dow, Prohibitor, 67; Phelps, Anti-Masonic, 91; Garfield over Hancock, 29,743; Garfield over all, 21,603....The vote of Massachusetts, as officially declared, was: For Garfield, 165,198; Hancock, 111,960; Weaver, 4,584; Dow, 582. ....The official vote of Oregon gives Garfield 763 majority.

The official vote of the State of New York is as follows: Garfield, 555,544; for Hancock, 534,611; for Weaver, 12,373; for Dow, 1,517; for Phelps (anti-Masonic), 75. Garfield's majority over all, 6,968....The aggregate votes of New York, Pennsylvania, Ohio and Illinois—the four largest States in the Union—in 1876 and 1880 compare as follows:

State.	1876.	1880.	Gain.
New York	1,017,330	1,104,120	86,790
Pennsylvania	758,869	874,783	115,914
Ohio	658,649	724,953	66,304
Illinois	554,433	621,932	67,499

Relatively the gain of Pennsylvania is most and that of New York least. Illinois gains slightly over Ohio, but the Buckeye State still keeps far ahead....The official vote of Mississippi for President is as follows: Hancock, 75,642; Garfield, 34,844; Weaver, 5,783; scattering, 670. Hancock over Garfield, 40,998.

Nebraska's official vote for President: Garfield, 54,979; Hancock, 28,523; Garfield over Hancock, 26,456. ...The official canvass of the vote for Presidential electors in Michigan shows the following result, giving to each ticket the highest vote cast for any one elector: Garfield, 185,195; Hancock, 131,301; Weaver, 34,895; Dow, 902; Anti-Secret-Society candidate, 322. Garfield's plurality, 53,894; majority over all, 17,775.

The vote cast in Indiana for President was canvassed at Indianapolis, on the 22d of November, by Gov. Gray, Secretary of State Shanklin, and Auditor of State Manson. At the eleventh hour it was discovered that the Marshal appointed for the Eighth district had not put in an appearance, and that the vote of Montgomery county had not been certified to. An examination of the law left the board in doubt as to any discriminating powers, and so they concluded to return the vote so far as it was certified to, and adjourn, with the mental reservation that, when the vote of the Eighth district was properly certified it should be added. The vote as canvassed is as follows: Garfield, 212,146; Hancock, 208,375; Weaver, 10 623—leaving Garfield a plurality of 3,771, instead of 6,400, as it should be, had the Eighth district been canvassed.

1876.		1880.
Tilden	521,949	Hancock	534,611
Hayes	489,207	Garfield	555,544

The Republicans thus appear to have gained 66,337 votes, while the Democrats gained only 12,662. The whole vote of the State, including 13,373 for Weaver, 1,517 for Dow, and 75 for Phelps, is 1,104,120, an increase of 93,904.

Stanley Matthews, of Ohio, who has lately returned from a visit to Mentor, gives it as his opinion that President-elect Garfield will make an entire change in the Cabinet, retaining none of the present members.

The vote of New Jersey, as now officially declared, was: For Hancock, 122,565; Garfield, 120,555; Weaver, 2,617; Dow, 195; Hancock's plurality, 2,010. The plurality of Ludlow, Democratic candidate for Governor, was 651....James L. Pugh has been elected United States Senator from Alabama....Indiana has chosen one Hancock elector, D. W. Chambers defeating B. S. Parker through a Republican blunder in making up the tickets. The latter was substituted for Gen. Bennett, of Richmond, just before the election.

Senator Carpenter is said to favor the election of Postmaster Keyes as the successor of Senator Angus Cameron, in the Senate, from Wisconsin.

WASHINGTON.

Director of the Mint Burchard will oppose any measure looking to the stoppage of the coinage of the standard silver dollar. He thinks more of them are wanted....Bedford and Queenan, colored, were executed at Washington for the murder of George P. Hirth in January last. Both protested their innocence.

The Indian Bureau reports a heavy demand by the reds at the agencies for implements for manual labor. Our total Indian population is about 250,000, of whom 60,000 are colonized in Indian Territory. New York State has 5,000 copper-colored inhabitants, and Michigan 10,000.

There are over a quarter of a million of recipients of pensions in the United States. Commissioner Bentley estimates that $50,000,000 will be required to pay them for the current year....The Treasurer of the United States reports that for the fiscal year the receipts from customs, internal revenue, and public lands increased nearly $60,000,000 over the preceding twelvemonth....The total coinage of standard silver dollars, under the act of 1878, up to the first of November, was $72,847,750, of which at that date $47,586,106 remained in the treasury....Since resumption of specie payments all told but $11,963,336 in greenbacks have been presented for redemption....The total receipts in the United States treasury for the past fiscal year were $494,578,241....Gen. Schofield has asked to be relieved from the command of the Department of West Point.

The exclusion from the mails of newspapers containing lottery advertisements is recommended by Postmaster General Maynard. ....President Hayes is the recipient of a handsome present from Queen Victoria. The gift is a massive oak desk made out of the timbers of H. M. S. Resolute.... The administration does not intend to allow the Indians to be squeezed out of the Indian Territory by squatters. The arrest of a number of the advance guard of the invaders has been reported to the War Department, and all who shall attempt to follow will be dealt with in like manner.

Gen. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, has ordered a second investigation of the South Carolina census. Neither the President, Secretary Schurz nor Superintendent Walker believes the census to have been stuffed or fraudulent, but they are aware, from interviews with Northern members of Congress, that unless there is the most thorough and searching investigation it will be almost a hopeless task to try and make apportionments under the recent census. The clamor on the subject came mainly from New England.... Gen. Garfield arrived at Washington last week. He was met at the depot by a few friends, including Cols. Rockwell and Ingersoll, and driven to his home on Thirteenth street. He declined a reception. Secretary Sherman made a formal call upon the President-elect, and subsequently told a friend that he intended to remain in the Senatorial contest.

GENERAL.

Signor Blitz, the well-known prestidigitator, has made his final exit. While duck-hunting in New Jersey he stepped out of his boat, drawing his gun after him. The trigger caught on the boat-rail and the gun was discharged, killing him....Capt. Ericsson has invented a new torpedo-boat, which is said to be the most terrible instrument of naval warfare yet constructed. It carries seven feet under water a steel gun of sixteen inches caliber, discharging projectiles of 250 pounds each.

The cattle trade with England continues to make great progress. During the last three months 16,769 head from this country were landed in England, as against 10,249 during the corresponding period of last year....

It is stated that at a meeting of the railroad Presidents in New York, including Vanderbilt, Coolidge, of the Atchison, Topeka and Santa Fe road, and John M. Forbes, of the Chicago, Burlington and Quincy road, an alliance was consummated of the interests of the New York Central, Lake Shore, Atlantic and Pacific railroads and the roads first mentioned, forming a community of interests in opposition to the Gould roads and accomplishing one of the most gigantic combinations ever attempted....A Bombay merchant prince named Esoofally Hiptala, has arrived at New York. He brought with him his four wives, all native Hindoos. The latter are in charge of a woman and an eunuch. The Prince is also provided with a conjurer, a snake-charmer and a dancing woman. He talks quite freely, and says he came to see the United States and its people.

The Northern Pacific has secured from a syndicate of American and European bankers the sum of $40,000,000, by the sale of bonds at prices ranging from 90 cents to par. Director Wright reports the rails laid within thirty miles of the Yellowstone, and predicts the completion of the road within three years. Steel rails will soon be shipped around the Horn, to be laid on the western end.

The Supreme Court of the United States has decided in the case of the Pennsylvania Company that the railway over which Pullman cars are run is liable for any injury to passengers occasioned by the negligence of the Pullman porter or conductor, or through any defect of the sleeping car. The ground of the decision is that the railways cannot, by their contract with the sleeping car company, absolve themselves from their contract to safely carry passengers, and must be responsible for all losses, through defect or negligence, occurring on the entire train. ....A body of Mexican soldiers returning from their victory over the Apaches were surprised by an ambushed party, numbering forty of the latter, and nine of the Mexicans were killed.... At a meeting of the Woman's National Relief Society, in New York, the following officers were elected: President, Mrs. Rutherford B. Hayes; First Vice President, Mrs. Waite, wife of the Chief Justice.

A printing office attached to Hostetter & Smith's bitters factory in Pittsburgh was destroyed by fire, involving the loss of $35,000. The flouring-mills of Gardner, Campbell & Co., at Irving, Mich., were consumed, causing $35,000 loss. The saw-mill and salt works of A. D. Camp, at East Saginaw, Mich., were burned, wiping out $30,000....The English clipper ship Boyne has been abandoned in the St. Lawrence, with a cargo of grain worth $70,000.

The Quebec Colonization Company announces the complete success in London of its scheme for colonizing the wild lands of Quebec with farmers from England....The New York Times withdraws its proposal to raise a fund for the sustentation of ex-Presidents of the United States....Reports of disasters on the North Atlantic coast during the late terrible gales continue to be received. An appalling number of vessels have been wrecked, and the loss of life has been terrible, the storm being so fierce that there was no prospect of wrecked sailors reaching shore.

FOREIGN.

The Irish Land League has invested its funds in foreign securities and deposited them in a continental bank, to forestall seizure. The custodian of a farm near New Pallas, Ireland, from which a tenant had been evicted, was shot dead from behind a grove. Two brothers named Moore have been arrested for the murder of Wheeler. Every Liberal journal in England and Scotland opposes a session of Parliament and a coercive policy. The French authorities promise to watch the movements of Parnell on their soil.... The anti-Jewish agitation in Prussia is increasing in bitterness....An explosion of fire-damp at Mons, Belgium, killed twelve men and injured fifteen others....Gonzalez, the President-elect of Mexico, has arrived at the capital. The public debt is $144,000,000....Twenty-three lives were lost by the foundering of the British steamer Mildred.

A St. Petersburg dispatch says that "a large number of Nihilist placards have just appeared upon the walls of St. Petersburg, some of them in the most frequented parts of the city. They proclaim in flaming characters the beginning of a fresh revolutionary movement, beside which all former agitations will be considered puerile and insignificant. Ominous warning is given that the throne of Alexander will be vacant before the dawn of another year."

Accounts received from various parts of Ireland represent the state of the country as still more disturbed and demoralized. The combination against the payment of rents is extending into districts hitherto peaceable. In England, the Queen's protracted stay in Balmoral elicits the usual hostile comments from the press and society. It obliges a Cabinet Minister to journey thither at a moment when the gravest decisions have to be taken in London. Thomas Power O'Connor, M. P., speaking at a public meeting in Galway, said: "When the objects of the Land League shall have been attained, the Irish people will have a more noble course in view—to wrench themselves from the rule of England." Three hundred men will be added to the constabulary in the Counties Mayo and Galway. Royal dragoons are employed in escorting Boycott's cattle to market. The Colonel of the Hussars has prosecuted a Dublin newspaper for stating that his men stole and ate one of Boycott's sheep.... Revs. Enright and Green, British ritualists, having ignored their suspension from office, are to be imprisoned for contempt....An aged female servant at Windermere, England, has fallen heir to $1,500,000....A billiard match for the championship of the world will be played at Paris between Slosson, of New York, and Vignaux, the great French expert. The contest will be one of 3,500 points, 700 points to be played each night for five successive nights.... Edwin Booth, after playing Hamlet for two weeks in London to fine houses, opened his third week in his great character of Richelieu. A cable dispatch informs us that "The grandeur of Mr. Booth's acting was instantly recognized and enthusiastically appreciated, and he was imperatively summoned before the curtain at the end of each act. His greatest triumph was in the fourth act, in the scene with Julie, the curse of Rome eliciting a tremendous burst of applause and a double recall."... A veteran of the Peninsular war, and of Waterloo, Field Marshal General Sir Charles Yorke, has just died in London. Sir Alexander Cockburn, Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench, is also dead.

Seventy-eight persons are under special police protection in Ireland....The Irish Bishops represent to the Pope that they may be driven to support the Land League. Parnell appeals to the American people to assist the agitation. After a free fight at Ballina, County Cork, the police arrested a Land Leaguer for obstructing the street.....The Persian troops have destroyed twenty-five Kurdish villages. The Persian authorities try to excuse themselves from all blame for the barbarities by saying that the troops acted contrary to orders.

The violence of the anti-Jewish movement in Germany is largely attributed to Prince Bismarck, who early in his career opposed the admission of Jews to Parliament and is known to cherish strong prejudices against them.....War is threatened between Egypt and Abyssinia. Troops have already been dispatched from Cairo to the Abyssinian frontier, and the Abyssinian monarch has issued a proclamation ordering all Mussulmans in his dominions to leave or become Christians.... At the coming session of Parliament, Beaconsfield intends to move the suspension in Ireland of the Habeas-Corpus act....The German press strongly condemns the British Government for its policy of toleration toward Ireland....The Parliament of Queensland has passed a bill for the construction of a transcontinental railway.

Mrs. Estella Anna Lewis, the authoress of "Sappho" and other poems under the nom de plume of "Stella," died suddenly at London of heart disease. She was a cousin of Edgar Allen Poe....An appalling catastrophe occurred off the Italian coast on the morning of Nov. 24. The Italian steamer Ortigia came into collision in the Gulf of Spezzia with the French steamer Oncle Joseph, which had on board 200 passengers. The Oncle Joseph was so badly damaged that she sank soon after the collision, and 200 passengers went down with her. The Ortigia put into Leghorn in a very damaged condition....The Turks have wrested Dulcigno from the Albanians after an eight hours' battle, in which both sides suffered considerable loss.....The Persians have ornamented the walls of the prison at Tabreez with the heads of 300 Kurds made prisoners in a recent battle.... The trial of the indicted Land-Leaguers will commence Dec. 17, at Dublin. Healy, Mr. Parnell's Secretary, has been elected to Parliament from the Borough of Wexford, without opposition. Fourteen men have been jailed at Cork for firing on the police. Fifty-seven sacks of Boycott's grain have reached Cong, escorted by cavalry, infantry, police, and Ulstermen. Three shots were fired at a landlord near Lough Rea, who refused to accept the Griffith valuation. Telegrams from Dublin and Cork state that large quantities of arms and ammunition are received daily and distributed throughout Ireland. The invoices are principally from America. An attempt was made to shoot a Protestant clergyman in Tipperary, and a large rent-ing farmer was fired upon in Roscommon. Sixty persons have been arrested at Westport for threatened resistance to an eviction.... There was an extraordinary meeting of the British Cabinet last week. Mr. Forster had an audience with the Queen, presumably about Irish matters, before he went to the meeting. He stated to his colleagues that there was no necessity for coercive legislation for Ireland just at present. The Cabinet adopted Mr. Forster's views, and adjourned not to meet till after Christmas.

REPORT OF THE INDIAN BUREAU.

The annual report of the Indian Bureau for 1880 exhibits a continued steady advancement toward civilization on the part of nearly all the Indian tribes, and a very remarkable progress in many instances, especially among the Ogallallas and Brule Sioux. In Dakota and the Pacific coast the Indians collected at the Yakima Agency. The demands upon the bureau by the Indians of a large majority of the agencies for implements with which to enable them to perform manual labor are far beyond the means at the disposal of the department for that purpose.

The desire of the Indians to labor is steadily growing, and a large number are willing and anxious to engage in civilized pursuits, and the improvement in their manner of putting in and caring for the crops raised shows that the efforts of the past few years are gradually bringing them to a self-supporting condition. The number of Indians in the United States, exclusive of Alaska, is reported at 255,934, all of whom, except about 18,000, are more or less under direct control of agencies of the Government. The civilized Indians now in the Territory number 60,560, and the uncivilized 17,750. There are, in round numbers, 25,000 Indians in Dakota, 23,000 in New Mexico, 21,000 in Montana, 17,000 in Arizona, and 14,000 in Washington Territory. It appears there are upward of 5,000 Indians in New York State, and more than 10,000 in the State of Michigan. The following table shows the substantial results of Indian labor during the year by Indians, exclusive of five civilized tribes of the Indian Territory:

Number of acres broken by Indians	27,283
Number of acres cultivated	170,847
Number of bushels of wheat raised	415,777
Number of bushels of corn raised	660,439
Number of bushels of oats and barley raised	222,439
Number of bushels of vegetables raised	376,145
Number of tons of hay cut	56,527
Number of cattle owned	78,812
Number of sheep owned	864,137
By Five Civilized Tribes.
Number of acres cultivated	314,396
Number of bushels of wheat raised	336,424
Number of bushels of corn raised	2,346,042
Number of bushels of oats and barley raised	124,563
Number of bushels of vegetables raised	595,980
Number of bales of cotton raised	1,600
Number of tons of hay cut	14,000
Number of cattle owned	297,040
Number of swine owned	400,280

During the year sixty boarding and 110 day schools have been in operation among the different Indian tribes, exclusive of the five civilized tribes in the Indian Territory, which have been attended by over 7,000 children and taught by 316 teachers. The educational work of the bureau could have been enlarged to a much greater extent but for the inadequate appropriations made by Congress for the support of the schools. Fifty thousand Indians at seventeen agencies have no treaty school funds whatever, and educational facilities must depend entirely on general appropriation for education. Among those tribes there are at least 7,000 children of school age. Reports from the schools on the various reservations are full of encouragement, showing increased and more regular attendance of pupils, and growing interest in education on the part of parents. In compliance with the appeals from neglected agencies, the bureau has made arrangements for erecting eleven boarding-school buildings during the coming season, and for the establishment of thirteen new boarding schools. These will be the first schools of any kind ever provided for the 8,000 San Carlos Apaches and Western Shoshones, and the first boarding schools opened for the 25,000 Indians at the nine other agencies. The day-schools have hitherto met with indifferent success and made little impression on the tribes among whom they were located. The condition of the Poncas in the Indian Territory continues to be prosperous. They have now seventy-nine houses, and, since the 1st of January last, over seventy families have moved into houses. Meddlesome persons are still endeavoring to induce the Poncas to abandon their present location and return to Dakota, but the leading men of the tribe have frequently assured the Agent that they are satisfied and do not desire to return.

The New Chinese Treaty.

It is announced from Washington that the State Department has received enough of the Chinese treaty by telegraph to indicate the nature of the treaty. The text of the treaty itself cannot reach this city under four or five weeks. The text of it then will be transmitted by the State Department under the seal of secrecy to the Senate for ratification. It is understood that this document does not change the status of American citizens in China, nor does it enter into the commercial features covered by the Reed treaty of 1858. It is in accordance with Secretary Evarts' policy of restraining further immigration of Chinese to this country, while at the same time not going to the extreme of sending those back who are already here.

No master of any vessel owned in whole or in part by a citizen of the United States, or by any foreign country, shall take on board from any port in the Chinese empire or other foreign ports any number of Chinese passengers, male or female, in excess of the number of fifteen, to bring them within the jurisdiction of the United States. Any master of a vessel who violates this clause of treaty shall be considered guilty of a misdemeanor.

No Consul or Consular Agent of the United States can grant a certificate to any vessel leaving China for this country if she has on board more than fifteen Chinese passengers.

The limitations do not apply to persons officially connected with the Chinese Government, or to persons rescued from shipwreck.

The master of any vessel arriving in the United States shall be required to furnish a separate list of all Chinese passengers on board his vessel.

An elephant is used in a spectacular play in Philadelphia. He is kept in a stable several blocks away, and taken to the theater every evening at the proper point in the piece. One afternoon he took it into his head that the time had come to perform. Throwing his keeper aside, he burst into the street, overturned a wagon and several street-stands on his way to the theater, smashed a door, and took his usual place on the stage. The absence of lights and audience seemed to convince him that he had made a mistake, and he suffered himself to be led back to the stable.

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF WAR.

The annual report of Secretary of War Ramsey gives a general review of the various subordinate reports, calls attention to their several recommendations, and details at length the operations of the department during the year. Upon the subject of expenditures, appropriations, and estimates, the Secretary says: "The expenditures for all affairs under the control of this department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1880, were $39,924,773. Congress appropriated for the service the current fiscal year $41,993,630. The estimates for the service of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1882, are $42,697,055. The estimates in detail were originally submitted to me for $62,129,770, but, on revision of the same, omissions or reductions were made as follows: In the civil establishment, $13,585; military establishment, $250,000; public works, $18,514,129; and in the miscellaneous class, $25,000, making the total of revisory reductions $18,802,714. The same increase in the amounts of estimates for the year 1882 over the amounts appropriated for the year 1881 appears in the civil establishment, the military establishment, and the miscellaneous. For the public work I have reduced the estimates to accord with what I understand to be the amount required for the absolute necessities of the service. In order to prevent a waste of property and damage to commercial interests beyond such necessities, it is submitted. The wisdom of Congress may perceive that, as valuable improvements surround the realty of the Government, and as the commerce of the country advances in growth and prosperity, so should appropriations to cover expenses be apportioned.

"The Mississippi River Commission, operating in accordance with an act approved June 28, 1879, submitted a report which was duly transmitted to Congress last March, and was published by order of the House of Representatives. The report exhibited for the first time estimates of the appropriation required for works of improvement therein described, amounting to $5,113,000, and it awaited further consideration when the session closed. The commission has communicated to me its desire to renew those estimates, and this communication will be transmitted to Congress as a matter of special importance, not included, however, in the annual estimates and expenditures for the service of the department."

In regard to the South pass of the Mississippi river, the Secretary says: "The permanency of this important work seems to be assured from the fact that there has been no failure whatever in the maintenance of the maximum channel during the six months ending August last. This improvement has opened through sands and shoals a broad, deep highway to the ocean, and is one upon the permanent success of which congratulations may be exchanged among people abroad and at home, and especially among the communities of the Mississippi valley, whose commercial exchanges float in an unobstructed channel safely to and from the sea."

Secretary Ramsey concurs in the recommendation of Gen. Sherman that Congress be asked to give 25,000 enlisted men specifically to the troops of the line of the army, and favors the abandonment of many small posts and the concentration of larger forces at strategic points. The absence of a large number of officers from their regiments is alluded to, and action is recommended looking to the relief of the service in this respect.

Secretary Ramsey indorses the recommendation of the Adjutant General in relation to placing uniformed State militia upon the same footing in respect to its rules and forms as the regular forces, and calls attention to the necessity of providing by legislation for the organization, arming, and discipline of the militia.

The affairs of the Leavenworth military prison, the Secretary says, have been capably administered during the year. He suggests, however, that, in order to be entirely successful and to carry out as far as possible the original design of making the institution self-sustaining, one important measure of legislation is necessary, which is the authority of Congress to apply the earnings of the prison to its maintenance.

The secretary says: "From personal inspection of many of the fortifications referred to by the Chief of Engineers, I am able to emphasize his recommendations and beg to state that their incompetent and defenseless condition is discreditable to the country. Judging from the history of all other nations and the experience of our own, the United States will, notwithstanding our traditional pacific policy, find itself sooner or later at war with a maritime power. When that war comes it will come suddenly. There will be no time after its declaration to construct defenses, either fixed or floating. Other nations have been for some years and are now constructing fast war steamers of enormous size, incased in iron armor up to two feet in thickness, and armed with rifled guns weighing up to 100 tons, carrying shot of a ton's weight, fired with little short of a quarter of a ton of powder. It is feared that the country does not appreciate the fact that after a declaration of war a few days or even hours might bring these great engines of destruction to our coast. It may be to New York, or Boston, or Portland, or Baltimore, or New Orleans, or San Francisco, or any point the enemy may select. No one can estimate the damage which may follow."

The works of river and harbor improvements, and examinations, and surveys provided for by the act of March 3, 1879, and previous acts, were carried on during the fiscal year with satisfactory progress. The amount available therefor July 1, 1879, was $10,772,176. The amount expended to June 30, 1880, was $6,174,221, leaving a balance of $4,597,955 to be expended during the present fiscal year, to which is to be added appropriations by the River and Harbor act of June 14, 1880, amounting to $8,951,500. The act of June 14, 1880, makes provision for 343 works of improvement, in sums varying from $500 to $30,000, and for surveys and examinations with a view to the improvement of 144 localities.

In relation to the Whittaker case, the Secretary says: "I have refrained from commenting upon the unfortunate agitation which flowed from an alleged assault upon a colored cadet at the West Point Academy in April last, for the reason that, in some of its legal aspects, the subject is still under consideration."

The Silver Dollar.

Mr. Burchard, Superintendent of the Mint, says a Washington telegram, is very enthusiastic over the success of the silver dollar with the people. He thinks that we can go on with the coinage at the present rate without disturbing the money market or the relations between the two precious metals, for fifteen years, or till we have as many dollars in circulation, or in the treasury, as France has 5-franc pieces, which is about $65,000,000. He thinks that it would be possible to run the business of the Government without trouble with a gold balance in the treasury as low as $25,000,000. All that is needed, in his opinion, is to have enough so that the Government can continue to pay out either gold or silver indiscriminately when called for, and as long as this can be done then silver will not depreciate. Experience has shown during the last few months that the people are really more loth to take gold for ordinary purposes than silver. This Mr. Burchard explains by the fact that for small amounts, in the way of change merely, silver dollars are found to be more convenient, and for larger sums the bills are preferable, so that for actual circulation gold finds no place. Should any attempt be made by Congress to interfere with the coinage of the silver dollar, Mr. Burchard will oppose it strenuously. He shows that only about $25,000,000 of the silver in the treasury is there as a part of the reserve, the rest being in circulation in the form of silver certificates, the coin being merely held as a deposit, according to law, for the redemption of this paper whenever called for. The silver dollar is rapidly increasing in favor in the West, being called for with greater freedom the better it is known. It is sent to applicants to the nearest sub-treasury free of express charges.

Out of Condition.

In an action that was recently tried when the question in dispute was as to the quality and condition of a gas-pipe that had been laid down many years before, a witness stated that it was an old pipe, and therefore out of condition. The Judge remarking that "People do not necessarily get out of condition by being old," the witness promptly answered, "They do, my Lord, if buried in the ground."

Report of the United States Treasurer.

From the annual report of United States Treasurer Gilfillan it appears that the receipts of the Government compare very favorably with those of the previous fiscal year, and show an increase from the customs, internal revenue, and sales of public lands of $59,811,806, and a decrease in those from miscellaneous sources of only $112,079. The expenditures show a slight increase of $695,074 in the aggregate as compared with the previous fiscal year, caused by an increase of $22,906,040 in payments on account of the Interior Department, but show a decrease of $21,690,965 in expenditures for interest and premium on the public debt, on civil and miscellaneous accounts, and for the War and Navy Departments.

The balance of public money on deposit in the treasury, and subject to draft at the close of business June 30, 1879, was $417,228,787. The receipts during the year from all sources amounted to $494,578,241. and drafts paid $708,190,900. After deducting receipts properly refunded and outstanding drafts, there was subject to draft at the close of business June 30, 1880, $204,683,830, which differs from the debt-statement balance by $3,595,213, which is explained in the appendix. The business of the Government involved the transfer during the year of $11,033,357,082, the greater portion through the medium of accounts of this office, and the remainder by the actual transportation of funds.

Fifty-eight national banks were organized during the year; five failed, and twenty-one went into voluntary liquidation, leaving 2,102 doing business.

The amount collected from national banks by the Treasurer of the United States for semi-annual duty accruing during the year was $7,591,770. The total amount collected during the existence of the national-bank system is $106,361,369.

The report embodies a statement of the liabilities and assets of the treasury for the years 1877, 1878, 1879 and 1880, from which it appears that the gold and silver coin and bullion ranged from $114,464,982 in 1877 to $163,969,444 in 1878, to $221,807,308 in 1879, and to $214,308,215 in 1880. The decrease of $8,500,000 between 1879 and 1880 is represented by the reduction in the gold balance of $34,000,000, and an increase in the silver coin and bullion on hand. The influences tending to the decrease of the gold balance have been primarily the scarcity of notes, compelling payments of a daily balance to the New York Clearing-House in gold coin. There has been but a small amount of United States notes and gold certificates presented for redemption in gold coin.

There has been during the year an increase in the silver coin of $15,977,970 in standard dollars, and of $7,849,994 in fractional silver coin.

Note assets, including balances due from depository banks, have decreased from $107,664,287 in 1877 to $93,417,282 in 1878, to $63,926,858 in 1879, and to $42,402,314 in 1880. The steady decrease, the Treasurer says, is due in great measure to the withdrawal of notes caused by the presentation of Clearing-House certificates for redemption, the amount of these certificates outstanding having been reduced from $31,335,000 in 1879 to $9,975,000 in 1880.

Another reason for the smallness of the note balance, Mr. Gilfillan adds, may be found in the falling off in the note receipts, the revenues of the Government being now largely paid in coin and silver certificates.

From the tables of assets and liabilities of the Government for Nov. 1, 1879, and Nov. 1, 1880, it is shown that on Nov. 1, 1879, there were $151,047,044, and on Nov. 1, 1880, there were $141,397,031.61 available for resumption. The amount of gold coin and bullion in the treasury Jan. 1, 1879—the date of the resumption of specie payments—was $135,382,639, and at this date—Nov. 1—it is $140,725,952, and in addition there have accumulated in the treasury $47,084,450 in standard silver dollars. The redemption of United States notes in gold since the resumption of specie payments has aggregated $11,963,336. Since the order of the Department of Jan. 1, 1879, authorizing the receipt of United States notes for customs duties, there have been received on that account $142,323,601.

The total coinage of standard silver dollars under the act of Feb. 28, 1878, has been $72,847,750. Of this amount $47,588,106 are in the treasury and in the mints, and $25,259,644, being more than 34½ per cent. of the coinage, are in circulation.

The Treasurer instances banks which have reduced and forthwith increased their circulation to the former amount with the avowed object of relieving themselves from the trouble and expense of redeeming their notes through the redemption agency, as required by law, and says: "It is plain that such transactions as these are not within the spirit of the act of June 20, 1874. That act authorizes the deposit of legal tenders by any national bank desiring to withdraw its circulation in whole or in part. A wish to surrender circulation, with the reserved intention of taking out more at once, or as soon as a fall in the price of bonds shall make the transaction profitable, is not, it is submitted, such a desire to withdraw circulation as the law contemplates. It could neither have been intended nor expected that the law would become the means of enabling banks to operate in securities of the Government deposited to secure the redemption of their notes, or to throw upon the United States or other banks of the country the expense of redeeming their notes while maintaining and enjoying the full circulation to which the law entitles them."

AUBURN COURIER.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 2, 1880.

All of Gen. Grant's children—three sons and a daughter—are now married.

A gifted statistician has ciphered out the cost of the late political campaign, and makes it $3,000,000.

Two-fifths of the inhabitants of New York are of foreign birth, and in Chicago the proportion is about the same.

Complete census returns from Texas show that the State has a population of 1,565,433. The population in 1870 was only 818,579.

Neal Dow received sixty-six votes for President in his own State of Maine. Not enough to be dignified with the title of scattering.

Gen. W. S. Harney, of the United States army, the old Indian fighter, is 82 years old, six feet three inches in height, and stands straight as an arrow.

Mrs. Hayes has invited Mrs. Garfield to visit her this winter in Washington, in order that she may become initiated into the domestic and social responsibilities of the White House.

The Boston Herald claims to have pointed out, and established by a most plausible line of reasoning and probabilities, that the indications all point to Roscoe Conkling as the Presidential candidate in 1884.

Among the candidates for the Pennsylvania Senatorship, mentioned by the Philadelphia Times, are ex-Speaker Galusha A. Grow, Gov. Hoyt, ex-Gov. Hartranft, Representative W. D. Kelley and Simon Cameron.

Allen G. Campbell, who opposed Mormon Cannon for Delegate to Congress from Utah, will contest Cannon's seat, on the ground that he is ineligible, being a polygamist. This has been tried on Cannon before without success.

Green Patterson and James Henry Young were riding in a lonely hollow near Wild Goose Postoffice, McNairy county, Tenn., when Patterson drew a knife and stabbed Young to the heart. Patterson then fled, and Young died before he was able to tell the cause of the deed.

A highly-romantic escape from jail is reported from Missouri. A murderer under sentence of death, lying in the jail at Lebanon, Laclede county, not only made his escape from the jail, but took with him the pretty 17-year-old niece of the Sheriff and $75 of her uncle's money.

It is no wonder those two banks in Hackensack, N. J., burst up, when the enormous amount of work performed by Berry, the Cashier of one and Treasurer of the other, is taken into consideration. Berry ran the two banks; was President of the Fancier's Association; kept half a dozen Wall street brokers busy; was a connoisseur in the matter of dogs, a chicken fancier, and edited a newspaper devoted to the poultry interest.

"Buck" Grant is 28 years old, and Miss Fannie J. Chaffee, his bride, is 23. Miss Chaffee has been educated in Europe, is the only daughter of her father, and is the owner and mistress of a beautiful home in the fashionable part of New York, which, with its elaborate decoration and furnishing, cost little less than $100,000. "Buck" is worth in his own right from $100,000 to $150,000. The couple received from Senator Chaffee $400,000 in Government bonds.

The practice of shooting animals who are so unfortunate as to break a leg will have to be given up. In England a valuable cow who had that misfortune is now pursuing her customary vocation with a wooden leg, upon which she moves with ease, if not with grace. In the case of a race-horse it might be difficult to secure as good service with an artificial as with a natural leg, but among the lower order of equines there is no reason why art shouldn't furnish an effective substitute for a lost limb.

Dr. Mary Walker, like Elizabeth Cady Stanton, tendered a vote at the polls in the Presidential election—a vote which would not be taken. Mrs. Stanton's effort was made in New Jersey, Mrs. Doctor's in Oswego, N. Y. The inspector said that she was not a legally-qualified voter, and they could not receive the ballot. She insisted on her right to vote, and, the oath respecting the qualification of the voter being read to her, she said: "I'll take that oath; I am a fe-male citizen, and therefore a male citizen." She threatened to commence proceedings against the inspectors, but thus far they have escaped.

The official tabulation of the population of New York city makes the population a little more than 1,200,000, of which three wards contain about one-fourth. These wards are the Seventeenth, Nineteenth and Twenty-second. The World says: "The Nineteenth—which is only thirty-three years old, and which embraces the territory between Fortieth and Eighty-sixth streets, East river and Sixth avenue—numbers 158,000 inhabitants and outnumbers the present population of San Francisco. The Twenty-second ward—which is a younger ward than the Nineteenth and embraces all the territory to its westward—contains 112,000 inhabitants, a number several thousand in excess of the population of Washington, Newark or Louisville. The Seventeenth ward—which is a great German district to the southward of East Fourteenth street from Fourth avenue to the East river—numbers 104,000 inhabitants.

A member of the Philadelphia bar sleeps in his office at night. One night he was aroused by a loud rapping at the office door. "Why could you not come at a reasonable time?" "Because I am a cook and cannot get off any sooner. I have a case for you." Visions of a big fee instinctively arose in his mind; and, wrapping himself up in a blanket, he opened the door and admitted two colored men. One wished to obtain a divorce, and was willing to pay a good fee. "But I do not want that gentleman to know the facts. Where can we have a private conversation?" The lawyer took him into the entry, still having the blanket around him, where they remained some minutes, when the visitors left. He turned to the chair where he had placed all his wearing apparel and found it gone, including even his shirt and shoes. A kind-hearted policeman loaned him sufficient raiment to go to his mother's home and procure another suit. This young lawyer declares he will in the future hear no case unless fully recompensed at the start.

"Gath," in one of his readable letters from New York, gives the following gossip about Jay Gould: "Gould is very closely studied now in England by financiers who know what his movements are. The Hollanders are also impressed with Gould, on account of his large ready-money resources. He wanted to get hold of the Kansas Pacific railroad, and they agreed on the terms, and then said: 'Now, Mr. Gould, what time do you propose to make these payments, and what securities have you to give us?' 'I shan't give you any securities at all,' said Gould, 'and I don't want any time. I will give you my check on Morton, Rose & Co.' And he did, for $1,500,000. As an instance of Gould's excess of capital it is said that the New York Clearing House a few days ago showed the Fourth National Bank to have a balance of over $4,000,000, and, on inquiry, it was found that this was Gould's money. A number of German bankers had heard a rumor that Gould meant to borrow large sums of money, and pinch the street about the time they had some important financial movement to make. So they went to Gould with collateral and borrowed $6,000,000 cash from him; but, as he did not pinch the street, in a little while they went back with the money and demanded their collateral, whereupon Gould, having no place to put the money, paid the larger part of it over to the Fourth National Bank."

Fish for Food.

During the last twenty years chemists and physiologists have been studying the nutritious value of various foods. They have advanced so far as to compute the relative values of the common articles of diet. These have been so arranged in tables that the bread-winner of the household may see at a glance what food will give the most nourishment to his family.

A prominent subject of these studies has been the common food fishes. At the recent meeting of the American Association of Science, Professor Atwater, a chemist, gave some of the results of these experimental studies.

In one hundred pounds of the flesh of fresh cod there are eighty-three pounds of water, and only seventeen pounds of solids. In the same weight of salmon there are sixty-six and one-half pounds of water, and thirty-three and one-half pounds of solids. The meaning of these figures is that a family eating one hundred pounds of cod would be nourished by only one-sixth of it, while if they feed on the same weight of salmon, they would find one-third nutritious.

Next in nutritive value to salmon come fat halibut, shad, and whitefish. Then follow mackerel, bluefish, lean halibut, striped bass, flounder, and lake trout. The order in which they are placed indicates their relative value as food. Lean beef is less nutritious than salmon, as it contains seventy-five per cent. of water and twenty-five per cent. of solids.

While fish is highly nutritious and healthy, there is a somewhat exaggerated notion that it is particularly valuable for brain food on account of the large amount of phosphorus which it contains. The notion owes some of its popularity to a remark alleged to have been made by the late Professor Agassiz. "When I wish to be very brilliant," he is reported as saying, "I eat fish for dinner." But Professor Atwater says that the notion is not founded upon fact. While fish is excellent there is no evidence to prove that the flesh of fish is richer in phosphorus than are other meats.—Youth's Companion.

In Tallahassee, Fla., and other Southern cities, it is usual, during the hatching season of the mocking-bird, to steal the young birds from the nest, to be trained for singers. As only about two in a hundred live, an early extermination of the birds is probable. A Florida paper suggests that a law be enacted forbidding the capture of young mocking-birds.

A TYRANT'S PRISON HOUSE.

The Cruelty With Which the Nihilists are Treated.

A short account of the celebrated casemates of the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, in which the Nihilists are confined immediately after their arrest, will, I doubt not, be perused with interest by your readers. The writer, a St. Petersburg correspondent, obtained access to the casemates by a special order from one of the Grand Dukes whose name he naturally suppresses. The sight of the order when presented was by no means acceptable to the commandant of the fortress, but as it was peremptory, he had no alternative but to comply.

The casemates, it appears, are hollowed out under the Neva, and directly under the ramparts. Their only window, a little square hole, protected by a thick barred grating, rises but a few inches above the level of the river. A staircase of about ten steps leads down to them, and, as the aide-de-camp who acted as guide remarked, in a jocular tone: "Many go down, but few come up again." It would seem that the climate is not favorable to revolutionists. At stated distances there are iron doors opening into the halls filled with sentinels, who, with loaded rifle and fixed bayonet, keep watch and ward over the unhappy tenants of the cells which open upon them. The doors of the cells, also of iron, are very low.

As for the tiny prisons, they are very narrow quarters, square, with stone walls and floors, and fairly damp, the water constantly dropping about in all directions. A chair, a table and a pallet of white wood form the only furniture. One of the pallets was found to be covered with a bed of straw horribly foul, but even this, poor luxury as it was, must be considered an exception. The prisoners, the writer learned, were fed on a soup made of salted cabbage and black bread. On grand occasions, however, they were sometimes treated to a bit of meat and a tcharka, or a glassful of brandy.

The visitor was allowed entrance to a few of the cells. Their tenants were pale; they rose as he entered, according to order, but regarded him with a fixed look of despair. On some of the walls characters had been traced with a pointed instrument. One of the phrase ran thus: "My poor mother, you doubtless know that your innocent son is buried alive in this vault."

The guide interfered and prevented the writer from reading more. He was shown the famous cell in which was incarcerated the Princess Tarahanova, daughter of the Empress Elizabeth, who fell a victim to her rival, the Empress Catharine II., grandmother of the present Czar. This unhappy woman perished in the cell under the most dramatic circumstances. The Neva, swollen by the melted snow, suddenly rose, and the rushing torrent, dashing with overwhelming strength against the tiny window, broke in and filled the cell with water. The Princess was drowned.

The cells of the great state-criminals are lined with mattresses, and rings of iron are placed in the walls, to which many of them are bound when they are not straight-waist-coated. The guide informed the writer, among other things, that these unhappy men were asked every quarter of an hour if they were present. Whenever they failed to reply, they were barbarously punished. He also states that in the wall of the Emperor's room there is an invisible door, communicating with a little passage, very narrow, and leading to a subterranean gallery, hollowed out under the Neva. The gallery leads to the fortress, and in case of a revolution or of imminent peril, the Czar could disappear in a few seconds from the Winter Palace, and a few minutes after find himself in perfect safety in the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul, the guns of which in a short time could reduce St. Petersburg to ruins.

The palace of the Czar Paul I., which is now the engineers' school, was similarly provided; but when the assassins entered his room he had not time to flee, and was struck down at the very moment when he was about to disappear behind the secret door which was already open.

A Liberal Editor.

We were grieved to read the other day of the death of one of Michigan's jolliest pioneer editors—almost the last man of a band who published weeklies in the State when a coon-skin whould pay for a column "ad," and three bushels of corn dumped on the office floor stood for a year's subscription. Never a publisher was more liberal with his space. It was hard work for him to charge for anything except the tax list and mortgage sales, and he measured short even on them. One day in the years gone by his paper copied an attack on a county official, and old Mark was dozing at his desk when the injured party stalked in and began:

"You are a coward, sir—a—coward!"

"Mebbe I am," was the editor's complacent reply.

"And I can lick you, sir—lick you out of your wrinkled old boots!"

"I guess you could," answered Mark as he busted the wrapper off his only exchange.

"I'm going to write an article calling you a fool, liar, coward, cur, slanderer and body-snatcher, and go over to Ionia and pay five cents a line to have it published!"

"Hey?" queried the old man as he wheeled around.

"Yes, I'll pay five cents a line to have it published!"

"Say, let me tell you something," replied Mark. "I've got 200 more circulation than the Banner, and I'll publish your attack on me for two cents a line and take it out in mill feed or corn stalks! Don't trot over to Ionia when you can help build up your own town!"

Mark would have published it word for word, just as he said, and thrown in a cut of a horse or a stump-puller free gratis, but the official cooled off.—Detroit Free Press.

Tramps and Their Signs.

"No," said the vagrant with a sigh, "times are getting better; they're not what they used to be. A man's offered more work than wittals."

"Haven't you signs among you so that you know where to go, and how you will be treated and all that sort of thing?"

"Well, we each have sign of our own. If I see a big, powerful bull-dog hanging around the front door, I take that as a sign meaning 'move on.' If there are a few stout men in the next field to the house, that means 'too much gristle and too little meat.' If a load of cord-wood stands by a house with a buck-saw reclining against it, that's a sign for 'saws-edge.' Oh, yes, we have lots of signs—good reliable signs, too."

A Family of Chameleons.

The chameleons have long been an object of peculiar interest to scientific investigators, because of their curious power of altering their appearance to conform to surrounding objects. Dr. Bacheler, of Midnapore, India, has given in the Popular Science Monthly the result of numerous observations of a family of chameleons which he has been keeping. The chameleon does not change its color always to match its surroundings, but its power to hide itself by a change of form is no less wonderful. In a normal state of rest the color is of light pea-green, at times blending with yellow. The least excitement causes tranverse stripes to appear, running across the back and nearly encircling the body. These stripes occupy about the same amount of space as the groundwork, and are most susceptible to change of color. At first they become deeply green, and, if the excitement continues, gradually change to black. When placed upon a tree, the groundwork becomes a deep green, and the stripes a deeper green or black, and so long as they remain on the trees the color does not change. Placed on the scarlet leaves of the dracæna and among the red flowers of the acacia, no change was observed. But its changes of shape are still more remarkable. Sometimes it assumes the form of a disconsolate mouse sitting in a corner; again, with back curved and tail erect, it resembles a crouching lion, which no doubt gave origin to its name, chamaileon, or ground lion. By inflating its side it flattens its belly, and viewed from below, takes the form of an ovate leaf. The tail is the petiole, while a white serrated line, which runs from nose to tip of nail over the belly, becomes the leaf's midrib. Still again, throwing out the air, it draws in its sides, and at the same time expands itself upward and downward till it becomes as thin as a knife, and then viewed from the side it has the form of an ovate leaf which lacks a mid-rib, but the serrated line of the belly and the serrated back simulate the serrated edges of a leaf. When thus expanded it has also the power to sway itself, so as to present an edge to an observer, thus greatly adding to its means of concealment. Half a dozen chameleons placed in a small tree, not three feet in diameter across the top, are very difficult to discover, although one is certain they must be there.

Report of the Commissioner of Pensions.

The annual report of the Commissioner of Pensions shows that on the 30th of June last there were 250,802 persons receiving pensions from the Government. The annual pensions average $103, an aggregate for all of $25,917,906. Exclusive of arrears the payments for the year amounted to $37,046,185, of which $12,433,191 was accrued pension in new cases. The total amount paid out for pensions during the year was $57,026,994. Commissioner Bentley estimates it will require upward of $50,000,000 to pay the pensions for the current year. The number of cases in which arrears of pensions has been allowed up to Nov. 1—date of report—is 43,917. The average in each case is $569.

A table is given showing the number of pensioners borne upon the rolls at the end of each fiscal year from 1861 to 1880 and the amount of money paid out for pensions each year. The total amount for twenty years is $455,718,505.

The Second Auditor, in his annual report, has the following summary as to the condition of the unadjusted claims for arrears of pension and bounty:

The total number of claims remaining on hand June 30, 1880, was 29,470—namely:

Arrears of pay and bounty to white soldiers	17,164
Additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866	2,625
Arrears of pay and bounty to colored soldiers	9,523
Three months' extra pay to soldiers who served in the war with Mexico, act Feb. 19, 1879	158
Total	29,470

It will be observed that comparatively few of the claims for three months' extra pay to soldiers of the Mexican war, so far presented, have been allowed. The whole number filed up to June 30, 1880, was 3,966, of which only 167 have been paid, while 3,633 were rejected, and 158 remain on hand for adjustment. The time for filing claims for additional bounty under the act of July 28, 1866, expired on June 30 last. Many claimants do not appear to be aware of this, although the fact has been repeatedly published. Claims continue to be presented, but, as the accounting officers cannot entertain them, they are at once returned to the claimants. Unless the time for filing this class of claims be further extended by Congress I anticipate that the next annual report will show that all have been disposed of.

The New Apportionment.

A New York paper makes the following estimates concerning the apportionment for Representatives under the new census:

	1870	'80		1870	'80
New York	33	30	Maine	5	4
New Jersey	7	6	Vermont	3	2
Pennsylvania	27	25	New Hampshire	3	2
Delaware	1	1	Massachusetts	11	10
			Rhode Island	2	2
			Connecticut	4	4
Middle States	68	62	New England	28	24
Maryland	6	5
Virginia	9	9	Ohio	20	19
West Virginia	3	3	Michigan	9	10
North Carolina	8	8	Indiana	13	12
South Carolina	5	6	Illinois	19	18
Georgia	9	9	Wisconsin	8	8
Florida	2	2	Minnesota	3	5
Alabama	8	7	Iowa	9	10
Mississippi	6	6	Nebraska	1	[illegible]
Louisiana	6	6	Kansas	3	6

Congressional Representation.

Washington dispatches state that Gen. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, sees no reason why Congress should not make the apportionment under the recent census during the coming session. He thinks they will do so, as he expects to have the complete official returns before them in about one week after meeting. To make the apportionment is a very simple thing, if the vote can be agreed upon. This is the difficulty. The New England and Middle States will fall behind, and the loss of votes in Congress and the Electoral College will be so distasteful that Representatives from these sections will argue against much enlargement of the basis of representation. If it is enlarged, no matter how little, States like Vermont and New Hampshire will each lose a member of Congress. In case the basis is not changed at all, but a member allowed to every 131,000 inhabitants, as now, Congress (the lower house) will be swelled to 393 members. On this basis the New England States will lose two members and the Middle States six. Seven will be given to the West, and three to the South. The question will give rise to volumes of debate, and this only will prevent apportionment being made the coming session.

INDIANA NEWS.

Clinton county is talking about building a new court house.

Abe Gwinn, of New Albany, lost an $800 horse by epizootic a few days ago.

There were 27,189 acres of wheat sown, and 232,117 bushels of wheat threshed in Jefferson county in 1879.

Scarlet fever in its most virulent form has broken out among the children in the eastern part of the city of Richmond.

Mr. John Carney, who was elected County Auditor at the October election, died at his home in Vernon after an illness of two weeks.

Joseph LaPlante, a wealthy farmer, residing a few miles below Vincennes, accidentally shot himself while attempting to remove a gun from a bureau in the house. He died in a few hours.

Jacob Gunkle, of Independence, Warren county, caught from the Wabash river, at one draw of the seine, last week, 1,400 good-sized fish—the smallest about four pounds and the largest ten pounds.

The New Albany city election does not take place until next May, but already there are eight candidates for Mayor, four for Clerk, four for Treasurer and five for Marshal, and not half the city heard from.

Up to date $332,000 have been expended upon the new State House, and it is estimated that work will be advanced hereafter at a rate which will involve the expenditure of $400,000 a year for the next three years.

Wm. Franklin, a wealthy farmer living three miles south of Spencer, and four members of his family have died within a few weeks, and one of the two remaining is dangerously ill. The disease is a pernicious fever, caused by blood poisoning.

While the congregation of the Big Spring church, eight miles west of Sullivan, was kneeling in prayer at an evening meeting, the report of a pistol-shot was heard outside the building, and a bullet came crashing through the wall and barely missed one of the worshipers.

Jake Francisco, of Madison, was bitten in the hand by a copperhead snake, a few days since, and immediately the arm became much swollen, and he fell in a dead faint. Liquor in large quantities was administered, and, at last accounts, he was lying in a precarious condition.

An engineering party of seven, in charge of Chief Engineer W. H. Goshorn, have been engaged for several weeks surveying the Wabash and Erie canal from Toledo to Fort Wayne. The object of this is to estimate the cost of a ship canal. Thus far everything has been quite favorable to the project. Congress appropriated $15,000 for surveying expenses.

A son of J. W. Brown, a farmer living near Hazelton, in Gibson county, was killed the other evening, a horse running off with him. The boy was letting the horse drink, with one end of a bridle-rein fastened in the halter while with the other end he formed a noose, which he put over his head. The horse scared and threw him, dragging him head-foremost, and, running against a log, killed him almost instantly.

Solomon Glick was gathering corn near Columbus, and his little boy Percy, aged 5 years, was standing at the front end of the wagon, and the horses on moving up stopped suddenly, when the little boy was thrown violently forward under the horses' feet, one of them stepping on his stomach. He lived in great agony, and had spasms almost continually, until relieved by death next afternoon.

The most notable pigeon-roost in the West is located in the southwestern part of Scott county, and covers many hundreds of acres of the forest. To this roost come nightly, in the fall season when pigeons are abundant, millions of these birds. They commence arriving as early as 5 o'clock in the evening, and often until midnight the flocks pour in. The birds commence leaving at daylight, and by 8 or 9 o'clock all have departed for the feeding-grounds, often hundreds of miles away. During the roosting season this pigeon-roost is a notable and exciting place. Hunters visit it from all parts of Indiana, and from Ohio and Kentucky. They come armed with shot-guns and long poles, and supplied with torches and sacks, the latter to be used in carrying off the captured birds. The hunters usually commence their work about 8 o'clock in the evening, and thence on through the night the scene is an exciting one. The roar of shot-guns is heard on all sides. Added to this is the cracking and falling of the limbs of the trees from the accumulated weight of the pigeons upon them. Torches flash on all sides through the forest, the crash of the long poles through the lower limbs of the trees as they sweep down the birds, the shouts of the hunters and the whirr of the wings of the rising and settling flocks create confusion worse confounded. Thousands of birds are killed nightly, and during the day droves of hogs roam through the forest to fatten on the killed and wounded birds left on the ground during the night's foray. At intervals of many years the pigeons change their roosting place, but never locating far away from the old roost. A week ago they made a change of base, taking new quarters a few miles distant from the former roost. The hunters are now bagging the birds at a great rate.

Neighborhood Nippings.

A German, whose name is unknown, was killed Saturday a week ago, at Goshen, by a Lake Shore train.

Mr. George C. Margan, a compositor in the Lagrange Standard office, was married to Miss Emma Speed Wednesday of last week.

The negro Lee, arrested at Albion, for stealing clothing a short time since, was sentenced Wednesday of last week to one year in state prison, by Judge Tousley.

The Methodist church and the handle factory of Kerr & Co., of Hicksville, caught fire Saturday a week ago, but the fires were extinguished without serious danger.

W. K. Sheffer, of the Angola Herald, says that Thanksgiving never fails to meet with a due observance by him and his better-half, for that day dates the anniversary of their marriage.

George Bishop, of the firm of Doherty & Bishop, dealers in carriages at Crawfordsville, Ind., has disappeared, taking with him about $2,000 in money belonging to his partner, Fisher Doherty.

—The Corunna Head Light observes: "Certain prominent gentlemen of DeKalb county don't love us as they did a few weeks ago. For a while we had visitors from all parts of the county. But then, there has been an election since."

Jacob Long, a section foreman on the Pittsburgh road near Larwill, Whitley county, was injured by being struck by an express train Monday morning while shoveling snow from the track.

Last week's Kendallville Standard announces the death of Miss Kittie Hinkley, wife of S. A. Hinkley and daughter of J. H. Hastings, of that place. She was an estimable lady, and her death is mourned by a large circle of friends.

The Kendallville Standard says that "Sheriff Williams is negotiating for the erection of a new hotel building in Albion upon his retirement from the sheriff's office. We hope he may be successful in his plans, as Albion is sadly in need of hotel accommodations."

George Miller, of Goshen, arrived in Fort Wayne Saturday night a week ago with $270, with which to buy some horses. As he was proceeding to his boarding-house on Columbia street, at a late hour on Sunday night, he was knocked down with a sand-bag and robbed of the whole amount.

THE PRIDE OF AUBURN IN ASHES.

Destruction of the High-School Building by Fire.

A SAD LOSS FOR OUR PEOPLE.

Last Tuesday evening about five o'clock, Henry Shull, living south of the school building, noticed flames and smoke issuing from that edifice, and hastened to the spot, when he discovered it to be on fire near the heating apparatus in the basement. He gave the alarm, and a large crowd soon collected. An effort was at once made with the poor facilities at hand to extinguish the fire by carrying water in buckets from the one pump in the yard. The whole building was densely filled with smoke which no human being could stand. Water was thrown into the basement where the fire was gaining headway, but it done no good, and that large crowd of people could do nothing but stand there and see their splendid temple of learning consumed. In a few hours blackened walls and burning debris was all that was left.

The building furnished and equipped cost about fourteen thousand dollars and was constructed in 1876, by Mr. J Case, of this place. It was substantial and commodious, and under the management of a corps of splendid teachers had grown in popular favor, so that its full capacity was required to meet the demand. An unusual interest was manifested in school circles at the beginning of the present term and the winter promised a result never achieved before, and now this sad ending comes like a blight, scattering to the winds that which would have been reaped in a rich harvest of the future.

The insurance on the building and contents will amount to $7,000, as follows:

Royal of Liverpool	$4,000
Watertown, of N. Y.	2,000
Niagara "	1,000

The basement of the building, it is thought, is not much injured, except in the corner where cord-wood was stored. The outside walls are all standing, the east and south side being in fair shape and but very little cracked by the heat. The north and west walls are bulged out some, at the top, while most of the inside walls fell during the fire. It is the opinion of several mechanics that the building can be repaired and furnished again for about $3,000 more than the insurance, and perhaps less.

There is no question in the mind of any one who was there in the early stage of the fire, but what it could have been easily extinguished had there been any facilities whatever for the purpose. A hand engine would have saved it beyond a doubt. Ladders would have enabled persons to enter the north upper rooms and saved many books, on which it is estimated there was a loss of $2,500. We have a hook and ladder truck, but it is said the ladders are scattered around town and it stands there a useless thing. Cannot the town board do something to bring into efficient use property that has cost money, and make provision in some way to more successfully fight the demon of fire.

THE ALBION SENSATION.

A Husband Attempts to Kill the Man Who has Destroyed his Happiness.

The quiet town of Albion has a sensation, which is attracting no little attention, from the fact that the parties who figure in it are among the most prominent citizens. Five years ago, W. Frank Clapp, cashier of the bank of Albion, and son of Judge Wm. M. Clapp, owner of the bank, was married to a Miss Peek, of one of the most highly respected families of St. Joseph county, Michigan. During the years of their marriage this couple have lived in Albion, surrounded with all the advantages that wealth and social position could afford, and the world was led to believe that the inner life of that home was one of perpetual sunshine. But alas, it was not so. A few weeks ago it dawned on this young husband that he had been the victim of misplaced affection, and that his young and beautiful wife was carrying on a secret correspondence with a Mr. Lyman, of Mendon, Michigan. This information was imparted to Mr. Clapp by the wife of Lyman, who placed in his hands the letters which had passed between them. A separation immediately followed, and steps were taken by the husband for a divorce, and the case is now pending in the circuit court. The Albion New Era, in a long account of this ugly affair, has the following:

"To those of his intimate friends with whom Mr. Clapp conversed in regard to his troubles, it became apparent that he deeply felt the great wrong that had been committed against him, but it was hoped that Time, the healer of many wounds, would perform its efficacious work in this case, but, as subsequent events have proven, this was not to be. During the fore part of last week, Mr. Clapp sen., went to Chicago, leaving his son in charge of the business of the bank, but on Wednesday, we believe, the latter went from here to Rome City, where he perchased a ticket to Mendon. From there he went to Three Rivers, returning in the evening to Mendon taking his wife with him, and together they called upon Mr. Lyman, at his own residence. Mr. Clapp then informed the alleged destroyer of his domestic happiness that he came for the purpose of asking him some questions to which he expected and demanded true answers. To this Lyman made some flippant reply, to the effect that he (Clapp) would fail in scaring any one, whereupon the latter drew a revolver, with which he had previously armed himself, and placing the muzzle to the heart of Lyman, pulled the trigger. Fortunately it missed fire, and it was not until the third attempt that it was discharged, the ball entering the right arm of Lyman near the hand, and lodging near the elbow, where it was afterward found and extracted. Parties now interfered, and after a desperate struggle, Mr. Clapp was knocked down with a chair and disarmed, and taken in charge by an officer. He had previously swallowed a large quantity of morphine for the purpose of taking his own life, and the deadly drug beginning to take effect, a physician was summoned and his friends here telegraphed for. A dispatch was immediately sent to his father at Chicago, in the meantime Fielding Prickett, the young man's attorney, and W. W. White, of Albion, leaving by the first train for Mendon. Prompt and efficient medical aid saved the young man's life, and after he was properly restored, an examination was held before a justice, and he was held to bail in the sum of $1,500. This was readily furnished, and he returned to Albion on Friday. While these proceedings were had, Mr. and Mrs. Lyman left Mendon for parts unknown. Thus the sad affair, which fortunately terminated without the loss of life, rests at the present writing."

Carr's Corner.

—Now is the time for farmers to go visiting.

—Mr. Christian Sheets returned from Kansas last Saturday.

—Joseph Williams has left the Stoop's farm and moved to Auburn.

—Sile Nuzen is learning to play the violin, and keeps good time with his mouth.

—James Swisher has fourteen acres of corn to husk yet, and wants "329" hands.

—Miss Nellie Potter, of Auburn, spent the latter part of last week visiting friends near this place.

—Miss Delia Culver gave a party to her many young friends last Saturday, and received a number of presents from the little folks.

—Sheets and Thomas have finished threshing, and are now running their saw-mill.

Joseph's Ladder.

In those days came Robert and his fat brother Jacob from the upper part of Canaan down to Egypt to hear the news.

Now when Jacob heard the sayings of those times, he was exceeding glad, and did howl like a wolf. And Robert, his brother, being a peaceful man, did exhort him to let up, and walk according to the Gentiles.

Therefore Jacob did hold his peace for awhile, and lo, and behold! a terrible light fell upon him, and he did cry out, "I have an idea."

And then Joseph murmered that so strange a thing should happen in their midst, and they were mute as stones.

For this was the first miracle that hed ever been performed in that region, and silence fell upon them.

Then spake Jacob to his brother Robert, and said: Let us hie to our brother Joseph, in the land of Egypt.

And his brother said, "not for Joe," but the counsels of Jacob did prevail, and they departed out of Canaan.

Now, when they had come to the land of, by name called Jackson Center, Egypt, darkness was upon them, and peace reigned in the land.

Then did Jacob reveal the vision to Robert, which was to varnish the pole of liberty at the capital.

Then did Robert kick, and refer to Balaam's ass, but Jacob being inspired did rebuke Robert for his unseemly conduct.

Now it came to pass that Jacob, being a strong man of valor, did seize Joseph's ladder, and did straightway carry it to the capital.

And with his little finger he did balance it against the tree of liberty, and when it was done he did dance like a Camanche, and did exceed himself.

Then did they proceed to varnish the pole with whitewash, and when they were done, Jacob had on more whitewash than the pole, so that Robert wondered which was tother.

Then did Jacob howl and cavort like a two-year old colt, and did prance up the road to his den.

Now when morning came, Joseph wondered and saw strange sights, and some did rejoice, and others didn't, allee samee.

And when it was nosed abroad what was done, Jacob and Robert were proud, and did spread their tail feathers like a peacock.

And they hastened down to the land of Egypt to see the sight, and laugh with the laughers.

But when the people saw the whitewash on Jacob they did smell a mice, and murmured among each other.

And they asked Jacob whence cometh this color? And Jacob did tumble, and said he wanted to see a man around the corner, and straightway departed.

And since that day Jacob became invisible, so that Joseph says he has crawled into his hole and pulled the hole in after him. And since then peace has reigned throughout the land.

Local and Miscellaneous

—There is quite an aged lady living on a back street, in the south end of town, whom some people call insane, while others think differently. But let this be as it may. We wish to inform the good people of Auburn that this lady, Mrs. Penny, is in destitute circumstances and also ill. One day last week a christian woman called upon her, and upon opening the door her eyes met a sad spectacle. Mrs. Penny was lying upon the floor in a helpless condition and almost perished from cold and hunger. Assistance was called immediately and everything done to make her comfortable. Do our people ever think of these poor, unfortunate creatures while they are seated in their commodious dining rooms with all the delicacies of the day set before them? We think not. Within the week just past many of us have seated ourselves to sumptuous Thanksgiving dinners, while perhaps a neighbor—for instance the one in question—had scarcely enough to keep away the cravings of hunger. Those who have plenty should think more seriously of these things and take it upon themselves to see that their neighbors, who are in a destitute condition, are provided for. We must always bear in mind that some poor people are "too honest to steal and too proud to beg."

—Thanksgiving was generally observed in Auburn. There were services at the Methodist church, dinner and supper at the Presbyterian church, the business houses were closed, and each one as taste inclined passed the day. Several hundred turkeys sent up delicious odors, and had the "stuffing knocked out of them" from as many homes in Auburn. About turkey time we wended our way to the residence of Mr. and Mrs. G. C. Ralston, where we found a hungry-looking crowd, composed of Mr. and Mrs. Wm. McIntyre, Mr. and Mrs. F. D. Ryan and daughter, Frankie, Johnny and Henry McIntyre, and Geo. L. Lanning assembled for the annual feast. It was a feast fit for the gods, and to which all did ample justice. Mrs. Ralston knows how to entertain her guests in grand style, and we hope that each returning Thanksgiving may find her table as well as covered with good things as was this one, and that we shall be around on each occasion.

—Some time during the summer John and Perry Smurr murdered a man by the name of Myers, at the Bloomingdale brewery, in Fort Wayne, the particulars of which will be remembered by our readers. John Smurr was brought to trial in the circuit court in Fort Wayne, and the jury, after deliberating two nights and one day, returned a verdict last Friday finding the prisoner guilty of manslaughter, and fixing his time in the penitentiary for life. The Smurrs are known as hard cases, and the sentence is regarded by the public as a just one. The trial of Perry Smurr, as a participant in this bloody affray, will probably come up in a few days, and it is likely that he also will meet with a similar fate.

—We are sorry to learn that Frank Copper has severed his connection as agent of the Jackson road at this place, and that he and his estimable wife will leave us in the near future. He has a half dozen good positions offered him, but has not decided as yet which he will accept. Frank is one of the boys, and by his genial spirit and pleasing manner, and close application to business, during a three years residence in Auburn, has won for himself the esteem and confidence of our people. Frank and Mrs. Cooper have been prominent in the social circle during their residence here, and will be greatly missed by the young people.

—One of the largest congregations ever assembled in Auburn was at the Presbyterian church last Sunday evening, to listen to the parting words of Rev. H. Johnson. It was an assemblage of our best and most intelligent citizens, and showed well the esteem in which that gentleman is held by this people. He left for his home in Grand Haven yesterday evening with the best wishes of a host a friends.

—The Immortal J. N., the renowned philosopher, skipped through Auburn Tuesday on his way to Churubusco. He will lecture at the courthouse in Auburn on Friday evening, December 10. He informs us that the veil has been lifted, the clouds dispelled, and that he is now working on the pressure, which will be very gratifying news to the many friends of the distinguished philosopher.

—Sickness is abating.

—The log men are busy.

—Fin. Gibson has a new baker.

—Kreuger had a break down Saturday.

—We have no use for a fire engine, oh, no.

—Coal oil is said to be good for frozen feet.

—The soldiers had a meeting Monday evening.

—Dave Hampton looks comical in a plug hat.

—Al. Weyer is going away to spend the winter.

—Sadie Hollister has returned from her Ohio visit.

—Frank Davenport has his drug store in shape again.

—Christmas comes three weeks from next Saturday.

—Wm. Valloo, formerly a resident here, is in town.

—The juvenile is happy—no school and good skating.

—Ben. Williams' little sawing machine is kept busy.

—Mrs. Fin. Gibson has been quite sick for several days.

—Elzy Shafler made a flying trip to Fort Wayne Tuesday.

—Henry Gugerli has erected a neat sign in front of his store.

—Dr. Tritch has moved his office to his residence, on Cedar street.

—There will be no preaching at the Presbyterian church next Sabbath.

—Miss Anna Wood left yesterday for a visit of two weeks to Port Hudson.

—Sherm. Hollister is doing a large wholesale and retail business in oysters.

—P. M. Bacon and family, long residents of Garrett, have moved to Milan, Ohio.

—There is some talk of a new sawmill being erected two miles east of town.

—Virg. DeWitt, who has been farming on Mrs. Jones' place has moved into town.

—Fred. Davis reports a pleasant time at a hop at Wabash, last Thursday evening.

—The wheeling has been splendid for several days and our teamsters have been busy.

—The janitor at the school-house, Henry Kelling, was the worst scared man on record.

—Johnny Kreuger left his mittens at school and his mother says, "they are probably gone up."

—Mrs. J. L. Davis has been suffering for several days with ague. She is improving somewhat now.

—Charley Dugan is teaching school two miles east of town this winter. He has a good attendance.

—And now the average school boy rejoiceth. He can skate and hang on sleds to his entire satisfaction.

—Two of the best-sounding bells in town are now silent—that of the Presbyterian church and school-house.

—An exchange asserts that a sick man is considered out of danger when the doctor discontinues his visits.

—Rev. O. G. Oviatt has removed from Newville to Butler, and will preach alternately at these points.

—Misses R. A. Canon and Mollie Matheny will spend next sabbath with Mr. and Mrs. "Curly" Miller, at Hicksville, Ohio.

—A temperance worker mounted a dry-goods box on the the street Saturday and delivered a temperance lecture.

—Our farmers are selling their porkers on foot this week, thinking that the most money is in this way of disposing of them.

—Mrs. Shoub and Miss Shoub, wife and daughter of Commissioner John Shoub, of Butler, were in Auburn Monday.

—Sherm. Hollister found a revolver on the streets last Monday night a week ago, which the owner can have by proving property.

—The ice men are happy. They have enough put up to "see them through," and it is of a better quality than we generally have.

—Schaab, beugnot & Co., are offering extra inducements in clothing. Now is a good time to buy.

—Fred. Clark and Dave Hampton, with that ugly hair all over their faces, look as serious as Presbyterian deacons.

—The smiling countenance of Johnny Schaab always greets you upon entering that mammoth store. Its a pleasant place to do trading.

—Miss Anna McFarland, of Mt. Vernon, and Miss Metta Farris, sister of Mrs. Frank Copper, are visiting the latter.

—Dr. Cowan broke a buggy spring, the other day; but little accidents of this kind don't stop the doctor. He hooks to another vehicle and away he goes.

—A large number from Waterloo attended the donation party Tuesday evening. A large amount of costly presents were given to Rev. Johnson and lady.

—Gaze on Austin's advertisement today. He is one of the liveliest boot and shoe dealers in northern Indiana, and takes pride in making bargains for his customers.

—Miss Alice McKay gave a pleasant party to a few intimate friends last Thursday evening. It was an enjoyable affair.

—Henry Gugerli brought his wife from the fire afliukin' and had her assist him in gathering buckets together for fear their residence would be consumed next.

—Mr. Stamets, of Lima, who was in business here last winter with his brother, H. H. Stamets, is in Auburn again, and will spend several weeks with relatives.

—Mr. L. Chidsev, living one mile east of town, who has been sick for several months past, is much worse at this writing and but little hopes are entertained for his recovery.

—There was no preaching at the M. E. church last sabbath evening. The members attended the Presbyterian church to hear the valedictory sermon of Rev. Johnson.

—The Neoteric club, it appears, is numbered among the things that are not going to be. Non est, defunct, busted, and Auburn will not have any public hops this winter.

—Charley Groscop, lively, jovial Charley, had a newcomer arrive at his house Wednesday morning. Its a young democrat, and one that Charley and his better-half can feel proud of. We smoked.

—J. W. Shaffer, the popular wagon maker on south Main street has his shop full of work. He always employs good workmen, and consequently sends out first class jobs. They have some nice work completed.

—Our enterprising citizen, Simon Ochs, has recently shipped seven or eight car-loads of wheat, and has about seven thousand bushels more at the Jackson elevator waiting for cars to be transported to market.

—There is a lively, jolly set of boys at the Eel-River elevator—Jack Ralston and Col. Watson. They are full of fun at all times and as accommodating as can be, and a better pair of workers were never put together.

—An exchange remarks that in an Arkansas town on a recent Sunday, one clergyman prayed for rain and another for fair weather, and Providence got out of the dilemma by immediately sending them an earthquake.

—T. C. Mays left to-day for Independence, Mo., where he has inducements to establish a paper in connection with an immigration bureau now being organized there. We hope it will prove a good field for his enterprise.

—Samuel Puff, esq., is making arrangements to establish a wood-yard in town. He sharpened his axe Saturday and will begin operations as soon as "the weather will permit." Widows and orphans furnished gratuitously.

—During the month of October the postoffice department of the United states sold 11,948,318 stamps, 26,731,900 stamped envelopes, and 20,964,000 postal cards. Total number 186,744,218. Total value $4,312,694. This is the largest amount ever sold by the department in a single month.

—Kenny Rush has given up western life and returned to Auburn—the home of his birth. He will "strike the iron while its hot" in John Berg's shop this winter. He will work at the same anvil that he did several years ago when he began his trade.

—J. K. Culbertson last week purchased the Bodine property, on the corner of Main and Tenth streets, for $915. He contemplates pulling down the old building, and putting up a new one in the spring. With such improvement this will be valuable property.

—We noticed our jolly townsman, G. H. McCord, laying the "persuader" on his mules in a lively manner, and a grin across his face about a yard long, the other day. We inquired why he was so happy and were informed that he was the father of a new bouncing boy.

—Rowley Tefft was "showing off" on the ice by performing wonderful feats in close proximity to a large air hole, Rowley overdone his part somewhat, and plunged headformost into the cool, sparkling water. He was rescued by some men who were cutting ice near by.

—Hank Ford's house had a narrow escape from destruction by fire last Sunday morning. A basket containing soiled linen placed under a table in the kitchen was consumed with contents, the table charred and one wall blackened by the fire. How it ignited is a mystery not easily solved.

—Marriage licenses in the past week have been issued to David Johnson and Elda Morr, Isaiah P. Bowman and Mattie Richardson, Geo. W. Wyatt and Clara White.

—Wheat and hogs have unexpectedly taken quite a boom, and the former has been coming into this market in large quantities for some days past. Wheat has been bringing one dollar per bushel, and hogs are selling at about four and a quarter per hundred on an average.

—The Auburn Historical Society will meet at Gordon's art gallery to-morrow (Friday) evening. The election of officers for the ensuing year will take place, and it is requested that all members be present. There will be reading and declamations as usual.

J. P. Ensley, Sec'y.

—The dinner and supper given by the ladies of the Presbyterian church Thanksgiving, were highly satisfactory to the consumers, there being in addition to turkeys and oysters, delicacies in great abundance. The results, too, were highly satisfactory to the ladies, as they stuffed the neat little sum of fifty dollars into the ministerial sock.

—Jim Potter, Dave Hampton and Os. Allen, like Nimrod of biblical fame, are mighty hunters. In the piscatorial line they are a success also, though their sport in this line is confined mainly to "fishing for trout in peculiar revers." The trio got their guns off very effectually Thanksgiving, bringing home a muskrat, a house-cat, two pheasants, four quail and eight rabbits as a result of their day's work.

—The snot-nose force on the bastard paper of the county, are worrying themselves considerable over a little item we made in regard to their annual. It would be an honor to the entire corps of the Republican office if they would shoulder an axe and perform the duty that nature ordained for them to follow. The whole "shooting-match" is used as a target for the ridicule and sarcasm of the northern Indiana press—but the children don't tumble.

—The grand lodge of Odd Fellows of the state met at Indianapolis last Thursday. The following officers were elected for the ensuing year: grand master, Will Cumback, of Greensburg; deputy grand master, N. P. Richmond, of Kokomo; grand warden, S. P. Tyler, of Franklin; grand secretary, B. F. Foster, of Indianapolis; grand treasurer, T. P. Haughey, of Indianapolis; trustees of grand lodge hall, J. B. McChesney, Wm. Wallace and A. Metzger of Indianapolis; representatives to the sovereign grand lodge, D. W. LaFollette, New Albany (two years;) Enoch Cox, Delphia, (one year.)

WAKE UP,

And Help the Immortal J. N. to Hold the Pressure.

The immortal J. N. will talk to the people of this place, at the court house, on the 10th inst. Let everyone turn out and assist this great philosopher to bear the pressure. We clip the following from the Toledo Blade: J. N. is in the city. He is closing in on the world, but as he closes he stands ready to relieve all from the pressure which position has created since the 18th of Feb., 1858. J. N. can now smile at the clouds which once enveloped him, and the sympathy which has been withheld for so long a time. Let all now bear a share. J. N. will lift the veil at Auburn, if he thinks the people can bear the truth; if not he will postpone longer. He will not urge at any place, for he prefers to postpone all his appointments from time to time. This divides the veil which has enveloped him. J. N. visited his martyred cell at the insane asylum last night, where he expects to spend one week a year during his natural life. All for truth. He speaks highly of the kindness of Dr Nolan and his worthy lady, and all the officers of that well-regulated institution." J. N. is much attached to Auburn, hence his desire to lift the veil.

For a Good Purpose.

There were about two thousand dollars worth of books destroyed by the burning of the college building Tuesday evening. Many of them belonged to poor children, whose parents are unable to replace them. Misses Alice McKay, Sadie Hollister Mate Cleveland, and Mrs. Copper, surviving members of the Young Ladies' Christian Temperance Union, are making an effort to raise a fund to replace the books of the poorer children. They have twelve dollars on hand which belonged to this society which they will contribute, and propose to give a mush-and-milk social at the residence of Miss Sadie Hollister to-morrow (Friday) evening to increase this fund. Much credit is due these young ladies for their charitable efforts, and we hope as many of our citizens as can, will come out and contribute their mite. "He that hath pity on the poor, lendeth unto the Lord; and that which he has given will He pay him again."

Lecture.

A number of our citizens have formed a club for the purpose of procuring a number of popular and interesting lecturers and readers for the coming winter season. The first of the series will be held on the 17th or 18th of this month at the M. E. church, and will be by Miss Emilie Gaven, who comes very highly recommended by the lecture bureau as an humorist and Shakespearian delineator. It is to be hoped that our people will not fail to appreciate the enterprise thus undertaken by our citizens for the good of our people.

A CARD

To Our Friends and Patrons.

We return our sincere thanks for the very liberal patronage bestowed on us the past two years, and now, having sold a one-half interest in our business to W. P. Harter, late of Root & Co., Fort Wayne, Ind., we hope that you will continue to favor us, and we will endeavor, at all times, to keep a larger and better-selected stock in all our departments, and sell goods cheaper than the cheapest. We again thank you.

Press Dots.

Melville R. Williams has succeeded A. P. Cosgrove as manager of the Warsaw Indianian.

The well-earned reputation of the Kendallville Standard is being well maintained under the new management of Mr. H. J. Long. Printermatically the paper is neat, and each week its columns are full of interesting local news.

The Steuben Republican is one of the most prosperous as well as the neatest papers typographically in the state. Mr. Miller has just purchased a steam engine and new type for the Republican, and has a fine brick building in course of construction, which will be ready for occupancy by the first of December.

—Dave Hampton, Fred. Clark, Fred. Davis, Will. Shaffer, Frank Leas and Elzy Shaffer attended the dance at Waterloo last night.

—We neglected to mention last week that our efficient sheriff has, after an untiring effort, succeeded in capturing the thieves that stole Sproot's team in Williams county, Ohio, last spring, together with a large amount of other plunder. They are now them in jail.

MASKS.

BY JENNIE E. OWEN.

The face too oft is but a mask
Which hides the heart below,
And oft it beams with sunny smiles
While dark the heart with woe.

A smile may hide a breaking heart
As flowers hide a tomb,
And none would guess that 'neath could be
Such loneliness and gloom.

A handsome face oft masks a heart
That's stained with crime and sin,
And sometimes fruit most fair to see
Is rottenness within.

The sweetest nut that ever grew
Is hid in rough brown case,
And so, a pure and honest heart
Oft hides 'neath homely face.

If life is then a masquerade,
"Judge not" was wisely said,
For who appears a fairy nymph
May prove an imp instead.

But wait, for there shall come a time
When masks no more shall hide
Man's vices and the woes that lay
Close hid by human pride;

But every heart shall be unmasked
Before the judgment throne,
And every secret sin and vice
And sorrow shall be known;

And every kindly word and deed
That was in mercy given
Shall show upon the human heart
Before our God in heaven.

[illegible], Ill.

A DINNER THAT WALKED OFF.

BY OLIVE THORNE.

The way it began, Hannah was cross that day. For one thing, she had a big Thanksgiving baking to do in an old-fashioned house, where pies and cakes were made by the quantity.

Then, while she was out of the kitchen a moment, Margery, in a frolic with puss, had upset the churn with its load of cream all over the snow-white floor. That made plenty of extra work; but the crowning disaster was to find, when she went to the pantry for the beans she intended to bake, that a bottle of brandy that she had kept last summer to bathe her ankle, which she had sprained in falling down the cellar-stairs, had been upset.

It stood far out of the way on the top shelf, but, unfortunately, the dish of beans was directly under it, and the brandy had dripped over them, soaking them so thoroughly that it was not possible to use them.

But the worst was yet to come. On finding the beans ruined, she simply emptied them into the pail which stood at the kitchen door, and, washing her hands, set to work to knead her big pan of puffy bread-dough.

Now the kitchen-door opened into a woodshed, and the ash-pail, with the beans on top, was supposed to be safe enough; but, unfortunately, on this special afternoon, the outside door was open.

The beans had not been there long before the turkeys came around to be fed, as usual; and one of them, of a prying disposition, noticed the open door, and, probably remembering the good things that came out of the door, quietly hopped on the step and walked in.

Nothing to be seen but piles of wood for the season, now getting severe, and —yes—a pail with something in it.

She did try it, and, not being sensitive in either taste or smell, she never stopped trying it until she had swallowed all the top ones, soaked in brandy, and then turned to go.

The effect was sad.

Her head whirled around, it is supposed; at any rate, her legs refused to hold her up, and she fell to the ground insensible.

Half an hour later, Hannah went out for more wood to replenish her fire, and in the gathering darkness stumbled over the turkey still lying there.

A glance at the fowl, to see that she was not outwardly hurt, and another at the pail, told the shameful story.

"Here's a fine bit o' work!" exclaimed Hannah, turning the limp turkey over. "The idiot has gone and killed herself entirely with those beans! I'd like to know who left open that door! Well, well, I want a turkey for Thanksgiving, and this one died by accident, and its meat will be as good as though I'd wrung her neck."

So muttering and grumbling to herself, after fixing her fire, she attacked the turkey, for, though she was sometimes cross, she was always economical, and she knew no questions would be asked as to how it came to its end, provided it was fat, and was roasted well.

In a few minutes, she had the feathers off, except those on the wings and tail, and she laid the picked turkey on a bench to cool, shutting the door to keep out the cat while she finished some other work.

Meantime, tea-time arrived; the family came home, and were all at the table, when the door burst open and Hannah rushed in, evidently frightened out of her wits.

"O, Mr. Winslow," she cried, "there's something in the woodshed!—all in white, and it ran after me when I went for some wood, and I daren't go out there, if you plaze!"

Mr. Winslow, supposing some animal had got in, left the table, and, arming himself with the poker as he passed through the kitchen, threw open the door.

Silence and darkness only.

Yet in a moment came an audible rustling on the woodpile, and an indistinct glimpse of something white.

"Bring the light, Hannah!" called Mr. Winslow; and, taking a candle from her trembling hand, he led the way to the strange object.

"It's a white—why, no, it isn't!" he interrupted himself, as he drew nearer to the fluttering, frightened thing. "It's —I declare, it's a picked turkey! Where on earth—"

"A picked turkey!" screamed Hannah. "Sure, and can it be the one I picked myself this evening has come to life?"

"How did you kill it?" asked Mr. Winslow.

"I didn't kill it at all. The botherin' crater killed itself ating beans that got soaked in my brandy, and I had to stop my work and dress it before it cooled."

"Well, it evidently was not dead," said Mr. Winslow; "but, now it's dressed, you better cut off its head."

"Oh no, papa!" cried Margery, who stood on the steps. "Don't kill the poor thing! I'll take care of it something."

"But it'll freeze, dear," said papa, going back into the kitchen.

"No, I'll fix it up; I'll make it something to wear. Please let me!" pleaded Margery, earnestly.

"Well, I don't care, child," said her father, laughing. "Do as you like, and dress it up. I want a fat gobbler, and not a five-pound hen-turkey, for Thanksgiving."

After some trouble, the shivering, naked turkey was caught and carried into the warm kitchen. It was carefully wrapped in an old skirt for the night, and tied into a basket.

The astonished creature rebelled and fought against the indignity of wearing a flannel skirt; but cold conquered it, and at last it cuddled down quietly in its strange new bed.

Through the long Sunday that followed the turkey was kept a close prisoner, and by the next morning many plans had been thought out for its comfort.

That was a great day to Margery, who was confined to the house by delicate lungs, and who longed for something to pass away the hours when lessons were over and the daily sewing "stint" finished.

Here was something to do! The new pet was fed, and the lessons and sewing hurried through, so that by noon she was free to carry out her plans.

By this time, the turkey had found out that Margery wouldn't hurt it, and was not so frightened as it had been last night; so when the little girl took it in her arms, it made no objection.

"Now you must have a name," said Margery, softly, carrying her new plaything off into her own especial corner of the big kitchen, where work and Hannah never came. "Let me see," she went on, "I'll name you after my lovely doll that got broken—Kristine—and I must make you some clothes, so you can walk around, and not be hobbled up so."

With the help of mamma, the busy little girl contrived a sort of coat for Kristine. It was made of an old shawl, and was bright scarlet, with black and white plaid.

It came pretty well up on the neck, and of course covered the naked legs; the wings were left inside. It was fastened together at the breast, and was really a pretty good fit—considering.

As ornament Margery sewed some of the fringe of the shawl around the neck, like a ruff, at the edges where wings ought to be, and around the legs. So, when dressed, the unfortunate, or rather the naughty turkey, looked like a new plaid variety of scarlet flamingo, with side-pockets and fringed drawers.

The appearance of Kristine stalking around in her new suit was very funny. How the boys did laugh! and even papa had to wipe away the laughing tears.

In this dress, the next morning, after she had been fed daintily, Margery introduced her to her old friends of the poultry-yard by opening the kitchen door and letting her walk out where the turkeys were taking their breakfast.

Margery thought they would be glad to see her, but alas! this distinguished stranger in gay attire was not recognised. They stared and scolded at her, and the old gobbler ruffled up his feathers, and dragged his wings on the ground, and came to her, saying, angrily—

"Gobble-gobble-gobble!"

Kristine seemed to be disheartened at this coolness on the part of her family, and slunk into a corner, as though ashamed of her fine dress. Then the family crowded around her to punish her impertinence in coming among them, and actually began to peck at her.

Margery, who was watching from the window, could hardly believe her eyes at first; but yes, they were actually pecking at the poor outcast, who finally fled screaming across the yard. Margery flew to the door, and Kristine hurried in, just in time to escape the whole family, who were close upon her.

"You poor, dear Kristine!" she murmured over her when she had her safely in arms. "Did they peck you?—the naughty things! You sha'n't go with them any more! You shall stay with me in the house."

So it came to be at last. Hannah grumbled a little, but, after all, she couldn't say much, for it was by her own fault that the poor thing lost its own winter coat. Before long the family grew quite attached to Margery's pet, whose name they shortened to Kris.

On her part, Kris was a very bright bird. She would come when called by name, and she never failed to be on hand at meal-times, when she would walk around the table and receive delicate bits from every one.

While her little mistress was studying or sewing, Kris would stand and look at her, turning her knowing head first one side and then the other, and sometimes saying, in a reflective way:

"Quit!"

As soon as books and work were put away she was ready for play. In fact, she enjoyed her strange life very much, and grew fat under it, so that pretty soon the boys began to tease Margery by suggesting that her pet was ready to take her place on the table.

The only time she seemed to be uncomfortable was when the cheerful kitchen was scrubbed.

No sooner did Hannah appear on the scene with scrubbing-brush, and go down on her knees to polish the floor, than Kris would hop, by a sort of ladder which one of the boys had made for her, up to a corner of the high mantel over the fireplace, and there she would sit, all humped up and miserable, till the work was done, or until her little mistress came and took her into the sitting-room.

The place where Kris was intended to spend the time of her banishment from the yard was a large chamber over the woodshed, which was kept warm by the kitchen chimney, and there's where her bed or roost was prepared for her, and where she was shut up every night; but she was so lonely and unhappy, and tried so hard to get out, and Margery was so fond of her for a playmate, that she generally got down before breakfast and did not go back until bedtime, which is at dusk in the turkey family, you know.

Well, the winter passed away and spring came. Kris grew a new set of feathers under her plaid dress, and when the weather became warm, mamma said she must leave off her dress, and go out of doors with the rest. So the first really warm day, Margery took off the red dress and drove her out.

Kris had not forgotten her cool reception in the winter, so she at first was careful not to go too near the turkeys, though they did not object to her now in her feather-dress. After a few days she stayed most of the time with them, only coming when called, and generally making a visit to the table for her usual treats.

She had not been out very long when one morning Margery went out to see her, and she was gone. No one had seen her since breakfast. Margery felt very badly, and, after looking all about, came to the sad conclusion that she had strayed away and got lost, for the whole flock wandered far off to feed. But the next morning, at breakfast-time, Kris walked in as usual and began to beg for food. Margery hugged her and fed her, and she ate as though she was starved.

When she had finished her meal she went out again, and about noon her little mistress sought her again, and again she was missing.

This now became the regular thing with Kris. Every morning she was on hand for her breakfast, and, in spite of watching, she would slip away and hide so that no one could find her again.

Poor Margery was almost heart-broken at this tendency to vagrancy in her pet, but Hannah only smiled and said:

"Wait a bit, and you'll see something nice."

But, though Hannah had her suspicions, she was not prepared for what really occurred one day.

After this strange conduct had been going on for a few weeks, there came a day when Hannah had another scare. She declared that tramps or thieves were up in the wood-shed chamber; she heard them and she dared not go up.

While she stood in the wood-shed telling Margery in a whisper about it, the child heard a step that she knew.

Kris hopped down on to the top step of the stairs which led to the room overhead. After a moment she hopped to the next, and after her came, one by one, twelve baby turkeys.

Margery screamed with delight, and ran to catch Kris and pet the whole family, while Hannah rushed up stairs in dismay and saw a sight that shocked her more than the fear of tramps.

In that room trunks and things not in use were stored, and a month or more ago Hannah had carried up there a large, square, "squaw basket" with a cover—a basket such as the Oneida Indians of New York State make for various household uses of their white sisters. This basket was nearly full of the winter supply of woolen stockings, all neatly mended and laid away till fall. In this basket, on these soft stockings, had Madame Kristine made her nest and hatched out her interesting family.

She must have found the door ajar, and managed to pry off the cover, which lay on one side, and here she had hidden all these weeks.

The room was put in order and the door closed, and Kristine was provided with a place in the yard. Every day she wandered off with her babies, but she never started until she had visited the breakfast-table with her whole brood to get her regular morning meal.

At first it was funny to see them run around and pick up crumbs, but as they grew it began to be troublesome to have a flock of turkeys so much at home in the house. So mamma made a new law, that Kristine and her family must be fed at the door.

After that, her life was like that of the other turkeys, only she knew her name and would come when called, and never failed to run up to Margery whenever she saw her.

And the dinner that walked away last year supplied twelve dinners this year, and provided Margery with a fine lot of pocket-money for her pains.

Husband and Wife.

A Providence woman who has been separated from her husband for twenty-four years is soon to rejoin him at Saginaw, Mich. Each one has believed the other dead for twenty-four years. When they parted they lived in Worcester, Mass., and when he went to Boston one day he heard of an excellent opening at Saginaw for a gunsmith, and as he had been doing poorly at Worcester, he thought he would give his wife a pleasant surprise: so he went out to Saginaw and settled himself in business, and wrote to his wife to come out and join him. She never got the letter, as there had been some difficulty between her husband and her relatives, they intercepted several other letters which he wrote asking the cause of her silence. By and by she began to think he was dead, and moved from Worcestor to Providence. He wrote to Worcester and couldn't learn anything about her after she had moved away, so he thought she must be dead. At Providence she set up as a clairvoyant, but no reason is given for the fact that she wasn't smart enough as a clairvoyant to find out from her second sight where her husband was, while she pretended to give just such information to others in search of it. Recently an English lady visited Providence and met the clairvoyant, and mentioned that she knew a family of the same name in Birmingham, Eng. The clairvoyant remembered that this was the home of her husband before he came to America, and she wrote to his Birmingham relations expressing her belief that he was dead. She received an answer saying that he couldn't be dead, as they had very lately heard from him at Saginaw. Thus she found him again doing a prosperous business.—Exchage.

"First Efforts."

I long for some patent method for convincing every man, woman and child, who is poor, unhappy, or wants pin-money, that they cannot rush into literature pell-mell, and make money at will. Above all, I should like a legal penalty imposed upon every one who sends a "first effort" to me. It is an equal "effort" and by no means my "first" for me to read their poetry, and for them to write it. I am fast becoming a misanthrope from the amount of trash, garnished with neither sense, grammar, rhyme, nor metre, that my fellow creatures perpetrate with a view of fame and fortune. Will anyone ever convince this crowd of imbeciles that to write even decently demands previous cultivation, information, and common sense; or that real genius is like any other diamond, and needs careful cultivating and polishing? I suppose not!—Atlantic Magazine.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

THE WORD "STARVATION."—Strange as it may appear, says the London Notes and Queries, it is nevertheless quite true that this word, now unhappily so common on every tongue, as representing the condition of so many of the sons and daughters of the sister lands of Great Britain and Ireland, is not found in our own English dictionaries; neither in Todd's "Johnson," published in 1826, nor in Richardson's, published ten years later—nor in Stuart's—Walker's remodeled—published about the same time as Richardson's. It is Webster who has the credit of importing it from his country into this; and in a supplement issued a few years ago Mr. Stuart adopted it as "a trivial word, but in very common, and, at present, good use."

HAIR GROWING AFTER DEATH.—Wulserus, in "Philosophical Collections," gives an account of a woman buried at Hornberg, whose grave being opened forty-three years after her death, there was hair found issuing forth plentifully through the clefts of her coffin; inasmuch as there was reason to imagine the coffin had some time been covered all over with hair. The cover being removed, the whole corpse appeared in its perfect shape, but from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot covered with a thick-set hair, long and curled. The sexton going to handle the upper part of the head with his fingers, the whole structure fell at once, leaving nothing in his hand but a handful of hair; there was neither skull nor any other bone left, yet the hair was solid and strong enough. Mr. Arnold, in the same work, gives a relation of a man hanged for theft, who, in a little time, while yet hung from the gibbet, had his body strangely covered over with hair.

HOT ICE.—A correspondent of Nature, after numerous experiments on the boiling points of substances under low pressure, came to the conclusion that it would be possible to have solid ice at temperatures far above the ordinary melting point. He says: "After several unsuccessful attempts, I was so fortunate as to obtain the most perfect success, and have obtained solid ice at temperatures so high that it was impossible to touch it without burning one's self. This result has been obtained many times, and with the greatest ease; and not only so, but on one occasion a small quantity of water was frozen in a glass vessel which was so hot that it could not be touched by the hand without burning it. I have had ice a considerable length of time at temperatures far above the ordinary boiling point, and even then it only sublimed away without any previous melting. These results were obtained by maintaining the superincumbent pressure below 46mm. of mercury—i. e., the tension of aqueous vapor at the freezing point of water. Other substances also exhibit these same phenomena, the most notable of which is mercuric chloride, for which latter the pressure need only be reduced to 420mm. On letting in the pressure the substance at once liquifies.

PHILOSOPHY OF THE ECHO.—A man somewhat unfamiliar with acoustics who wanted to experiment with his own echo proceeded to the vicinity of a large rock. He spoke, but no returning voice came. He spoke loud with no better success. At length, after straining his vocal organs to their utmost pitch, he left the place and consulted a man versed in physical science. "You stood too near the rock, my friend," said the naturalist. "Go back and stand at least 100 feet away from it and you will hear the echo." This is explained as follows: Reckoning one-fifth of a second as the time of pronouncing one syllable, the space traversed by a sound in this time is about 200 feet. Consequently an object must be at least half this distance before it can send back a single syllable, for the sound must travel to the reflecting body and then back. Supposing five syllables to be pronounced in a second and taking the velocity of sound at 1,100 feet per second, a distance of 550 feet from the speaker to the reflecting body would enable the speaker to complete the fifth syllable before the return of the first. This is at the rate of 110 feet per syllable. At distances of less than 100 feet there is not time for the distinct reflection of a single syllable, but the reflected sound mingles with the voice of the speaker. This is particularly observable under vaulted roofs.

BOILING WATER IN A SHEET OF PAPER.—Nature is publishing a series of attractive articles on "Physics Without Apparatus." In the latest number are given experiments for boiling water and melting lead on a piece of paper: Take a piece of paper and fold it up, as school-boys do, into a square box, without a lid. Hang this up to a walking-stick by four threads and support the stick upon hooks or other convenient props. Then a lamp or taper must be placed under this dainty caldron. In a few minutes the water will boil. The only fear is lest the threads should catch fire and let the water spill into the lamp and over the table. The flame must therefore not be too large. The paper does not burn, because it is wet; and even if it resisted the wet it still would not burn through, because the heat imparted to it on one side by the flame would be very rapidly conducted away by the water on the other. Another experiment of a similar nature, but, perhaps, even more striking, is as follows: Twist up the edges of a common playing-card or other bit of cardboard, so as to fashion it into a light tray. On this tray place a layer of small shots or bits of lead, and heat it over the flame of a lamp. The lead will melt, but the card will not burn. It may be charred a little around the edges, but immediately below the lead it will not be burned, for here again the lead conducts off the heat on one side as fast as it is supplied on the other.

THE competition for the proposed monument to Victor Emmanuel has been thrown open to sculptors of all nations. The cost, when completed, is not to exceed $1,800,000. Three prizes of $10,000, $6,000 and $4,000 are to be given respectively to the authors of the three best models, these models to remain the property of the State.

A Rapid Increase.

The paper collar has had a successful career so far. It was introduced as a novelty in 1853, and there was only a limited production for a considerable time; but as improvements were made sales increased and the annual product is now estimated at 150,000,000 of collars. There are nineteen establishments engaged in the manufacture, and twelve of these have recently formed a protective union.

A Strange Ocular Discovery.

Prof. Benjamin C. Merrill, of Milwaukee, has been pursuing a series of experiments, endeavoring to make the natural eye do the work of the telescope and microscope, namely: magnifying the size of the object to be viewed. He argues that the telescope and microscope are clumsy apparatus compared with his plan for accomplishing their work. He alludes to the well-known fact that near-sighted people have protuberance and globular-shaped eyeballs, while the far-sighted have eye-balls with flattened surface. Acting upon this suggestion of nature, Prof. Merrill has conceived the idea that the eye can be rounded or flattened at will, and thus increase the focal distance and do the work of the telescope. Accordingly, he constructed an instrument composed of two small metal discs perforated with exceedingly fine holes, which he placed over the eye and fastened it with a band around the head. The discs were pressed on the eyeballs by tightening the band with an adjustible screw which flattens the eyeballs, thus throwing the focus to a greater distance. The discs being finely perforated, the eyes are enabled to look through precisely as they can look through a veil. The Professor met with astonishing results from his experiments. As fast as he turned the screw the telescopic—we use this term in order to give the idea clearly—power of the eyes was increased. With two turns of the screw he was enabled to read a newspaper twenty rods distant! And with six turns he could, at night, see the moons of Jupiter and the rings of Saturn.

This marvelous experiment brings to mind the statement of an acquaintance made to us years ago, in which he said he could see a sail vessel on the lake when no one else could see it, and that the moon appeared to him to be seven feet in diameter, showing that his eyeballs were more flattened than ordinary.

Prof. Merrill has not made any experiment as yet to make the eye do the work of the microscope, which can only be done by reversing the operation and rounding the eyeball. This, he thinks, can be done. If his discovery can be made of practical use it will produce wonderful results. But there is the unpleasantness of having perforated discs pressing on the bare surface of the eye, which may prevent the discovery from being of practical benefit. Imagine a General of an army standing on an elevated position, with a pair of these perforated discs strapped directly on his eyeballs, directing the movements of his forces in the far distance! If it should happen to be slightly dusty he would not be very happy for the time being. Then, there is the danger of injuring the eyeballs by producing inflammation.—Exchange.

A Broker's Romance.

The scene of the romance opens in a palatial mansion in New York. A lady sits in a parlor filled with the most costly luxuries. Diamonds as big as filberts glitter in her ears. Lace costing $36 per yard almost hides the color of her dress from sight. A clock costing $18,000 strikes the hour of 4 p. m. At this moment her husband rushes into the house, pale, haggard, suspenders broken, hat bunged up, and his boots all mud.

"Have you—have you caught the epizootic?" she gasps as she starts up.

"Oh! wife, we are busted—ruined—gone up—smashed flat as a shingle!" he moaned in reply.

"How?"

"I invested $75,000 in the Crooked River railroad at 98 and it has declined to 4! Jay Gould has bought and consolidated it! We must leave this palace, and all these luxuries and works of art, and take two fourth-story rooms over in Brooklyn."

She laughed merrily and long. Had the sudden news crazed her? He thought it had; but he was green. She left the room for a moment and then returned with a pillow-case containing $200,000 in greenbacks.

"Let the Crooked River railroad crook away!" she laughed as she emptied the money at his feet. "You have given me this money during the past five years, a few thousand dollars at a time, to buy little articles of toilet. I had saved it up to get me a pair of stockings for Sunday, but I cheerfully hand it over to my good husband to set him on his pins again. Take it, my darling, and if you can get a whack at Jay Gould bite him hard, and I'll back you with the $50,000 I had laid away to send to the heathen on Christmas!"

Learn to Sleep.

The true art of sleeping is the power to shut one's self within one's self under any circumstances. The man who can thus take rest is refreshed and strengthened under many circumstances which would keep other people weary and wakeful. He is master of every situation as regards his own rest. Some men, by long habit, find themselves able to take sleep with the same ease that others would take a glass of water. They can sleep either while perched on a high stool or rattling along in a railroad car at forty miles an hour. The economy of wear and tear on the lives of such people is wonderful. The man who cannot sleep unless he has first removed his clothes, put out the light and climbed into his bed is at a great disadvantage. Greater yet is his disadvantage if he can sleep in no bed but his own. There are some who are possessed with the notion that their own bed is the only one in which they can slumber. These people are utterly wretched when traveling, or obliged to absent themselves from home on business. But he who has accustomed himself to sleep can enjoy that boon at any time or place, and is made better and happier thereby.

WIND.

Interesting Talk With an Old Signal Service Officer.

[From the Chicago Times.]

If there is a man living pre-eminently entitled to talk about wind it is Sergeant William Line, of the Signal Service Station in Milwaukee; the officer who, for five long years, held the post of honor and danger at the summit of Mount Washington—the very home-stretch of the winds of this hemisphere; where one hundred miles per hour is a zephyr, and where the inconceivable velocity of two hundred miles per hour is not unusual; where the cups of the anemometer, after standing the test of one hundred and ninety-six miles per hour, become twisted and torn, and fail to testify further of the tornado's wrath.

"I have seen it blow some, in my time," remarked Mr. Line, "but for something definite about my experience on Mount Washington I prefer to refer you to the official records." So the records were brought out and the correspondent examined them.

Under date of December 16, 1876, is the following entry—rather modest and business-like under the circumstances; it being borne in mind the locality was Mount Washington, and the elevation 6,286 feet:

> Temperature fell to —40 degrees (forty degrees below zero), and the mean temperature for the day was 22.5 degrees, with the wind at 80 miles at 7 a. m.; 120 miles at 12:22 p. m.; 160 miles at 4:37 p. m.; 100 miles at 9 p. m.; and 180 miles at midnight. The force of the wind was terrible, and at times masses of ice would be blown loose from the rocks.
>
> December 17th—Hurricane still continues; lowest temperature forty-five degrees below zero. The wind's velocity was greatest from 1:15 to 1:30 a. m., when it must have reached 200 miles per hour, and continued until long after daylight.

On one occasion Sergeant Lime experienced a change of 42 degrees in temperature (falling thermometer) in less than two hours. For months he lived in a constant gale, with the attending cold of mountain-top in winter. Upon several occasions Sergeant Line estimated (the anemometer failing to register) that the wind blew at the rate of considerably over two hundred miles per hour on the summit of Mount Washington. "But," said the officer, "it will be necessary for you to explain that the pressure of the wind at an elevation of over six thousand feet is much less, relative to its speed, than it is at the sea level. Just what the proportionate difference is I will not undertake to state, yet it is considerable. In our official calculations we estimate everything on the basis of the sea level; so that, for instance, when we give the pressure at this (Milwaukee) station we really approximate, and do not give the exact pressure.

Some calculations may be of interest: A velocity of a little more than 14 miles per hour gives a pressure of one pound to the square foot; a velocity of 28 miles per hour gives a pressure of 4 pounds; 50 miles per hour gives a pressure of only 12½ pounds per square foot; yet a velocity of 100 miles per hour strikes hard at 50 pounds to the square foot. There isn't much need of estimating further than that, and so we stop right there. However, the actual force of wind depends greatly on attending circumstances of rain, snow, hail, &c. &c.; and, as I said before, we only approximate the real pressure during any gale. There are some things about winds that would seem very strange to the average person," continued Sergeant Line, "and they are the subject of constant study and experiment. Now there is no instance on record of a hurricane having crossed the equator, nor of having been encountered on the equator. A cyclone, or hurricane, has not only a general forward movement—avering from ten to forty miles per hour—but also has a gyratory motion about the storm center that will give a velocity to the wind of a hundred or more miles per hour. As I said before, a hurricane never crosses the equator; but a cyclone north of the line will have its gyratory motion from right to left, while south of the equator the motion is invariably directly opposite, or from left to right.

A World of Good.

One of the most popular medicines now before the American public is Hop Bitters. You see it everywhere. People take it with good effect. It builds them up. It is not as pleasant to the taste as some other Bitters as it is not a whisky drink. It is more like the old-fashioned boneset tea that has done a world of good. If you don't feel just right try Hop Bitters.—Nunda News.

Women in the Treasury.

The first female clerks in the national treasury were appointed in 1862 by Secretary Chase, who placed them in the office of the Comptroller of Currency at $600 a year. They cut and trimmed the United States notes issued in sheets, and did their work very well. As soon as they had been appointed there were many other applicants, and their number steadily increased, many of them securing places through the peculiar energy and perseverance which will refuse to take no for an answer. There are now more than 1,300 women in the departments at Washington, the majority employed in the Bureau of Engraving and Printing and in the Government Printing Office. They excel as counters, their slender, sensitive fingers turning notes with great rapidity and exactness. They detect counterfeits, it is said, quicker than men, though they do not succeed so well with accounts, as the average feminine mind has little natural love of figures. Counters and copyists receive $900 a year, other women $1,200 to $1,400, several of them $1,600, and one in the internal revenue $1,800. Most of the clerks are well educated and refined, and many of them have seen more prosperous days. A number are widows and daughters of army and naval officers who lost their lives in the civil war. Very few of the young women or widows marry or resign, and, consequently, the hundreds who are constantly seeking places in Washington have very slender prospect of success. The most untiring, obstinate place-seekers at the Federal capital are women.

Fast Horses.

The standard trotter is one that can cover a mile in 2:30. It is said that less than 100 of all the horses raised and trained in the United States have this record. The number that can trot in 2:30 bear the ratio of one to 2,383 horses raised. As a business the breeding of fast horses is therefore very much of a lottery; and when we recall the fact that the high prices which famous colts have brought have rarely been received by the men who raised them, the prizes in breeding and training trotters are few and uncertain.—Scientific American.

Humbugged Again.

I saw so much said about the merits of Hop Bitters, and my wife, who was always doctoring and never well, teased me so urgently to get her some, I concluded to be humbugged again; and I am glad I did, for in less than two months' use of the Bitters my wife was cured, and she has remained so for eighteen months since. I like such humbugging.—H. T., St. Paul.—Pioneer-Press.

A Woman's Dress.

Bob Burdette, in the course of an article in the Burlington Hawkeye on the rights and wrongs of women, says: Our wife wants a dress. After two or three or half a dozen stores have been ransacked for goods, the dressmaker is sought out. The matter of measurement is tedious, and then the matter of fitting is one of numerous and repeated trials. Finally the dress is finished and sent home. Then it is sent back to be taken in here and let out there, and at last, after the customer has been fitted more times for that one dress than her husband has been measured for three or four years, the dress comes home for the last time and is pronounced by the wearer, her friends, and the dressmaker as a beautiful and perfect fit, and is finished.

Beautiful it certainly is, far more beautiful than anything her husband ever wears. Colors and material, style, blending shades and contrasting bits of color, are all in the perfection of good taste. No man can improve upon that. But it isn't finished. When it is completed as far as the skill of the dressmaker can finish it, and it is put on, it has to be pinned. Somewhere; sometimes in two or three, often in half a dozen places. It always requires a pin. Leave out the pin and the dress is all awry somewhere. On all this broad continent there is not one American woman who can dress so as to make any kind of an appearance in good society without pins.

Now, suppose our tailor should send our suit home, and when we had put on the coat we had to pin it at the back? Or suppose there was no suspender buttons aft, and we had to use pins there? Suppose he made our shirts so we would have to pin on the collar,—how long would such a shirt or such a suit of clothes stay in the house? Who would be responsible for the language used by the man who had to pin his coat? No tailor would dare to so tempt the wrath of an independent man. But woman—alas, she patiently pins on the dress that she paid some one $30 or $40 to make, and doesn't think anything about it. We will not pursue this painful subject. Let the women of America take it up, and think about it, and learn, in the noble independence of womanhood, to make their clothes before they put them on.

LOOKING BACK TO '72.

[From the Wheeling Intelligencer.]

That the great campaign now upon us will exceed that of 1872, when the "'Go West' philosopher" was in the field and fray, no one doubts. Time works wonders; but with some things it can make no change, as the following from our esteemed fellow-citizen H. F. Behrens, Esq., will show: I have sold the Hamburg Drops since 1872, and have never heard a complaint; I know families who would not be without the Drops for anything. Every dealer says the same.

Household Perils.

Under this head the Boston Journal of Chemistry names several dangerous substances which find their way into households. There are two or three volatile liquids used in families which are particularly dangerous, and must be employed, if at all, with special care. Benzine, ether and strong ammonia constitute this class of agents. The two first-named liquids are employed in cleansing gloves and other wearing apparel, and in removing oil stains from carpets, curtains, &c. The liquids are highly volatile, and flash into vapor as soon as the cork of the vial containing them is removed. Their vapors are very combustible and will inflame at long distances from ignited candles or gas flames, and consequently they should never be used in the evening, when the house is lighted. Explosions of a very dangerous nature will occur if the vapor of these liquids is permitted to escape into the room in considerable quantity. In view of the great hazard of handling these liquids cautious housekeepers will not allow them to be brought into their dwellings, and this course is commendable. As regards ammonia, or water of ammonia, it is a very powerful agent, especially the strongest kinds sold by druggists. An accident in its use has recently come under our notice in which a young lady lost her life from taking a few drops through mistake. Breathing the gas under certain circumstances causes serious harm to the lungs and membranes of the mouth and nose. It is an agent much used at the present time for cleansing purposes, and it is unobjectionable if proper care is used in its employment. The vials holding it should be kept apart from others containing medicines, &c., and rubber stoppers to the vials should be used. Oxalic acid is considerably employed in families for cleaning brass and copper utensils. This substance is highly poisonous, and must be kept and used with great caution. In crystalline structure it closely resembles sulphate of magnesia or Epsom salts, and, therefore, frequent mistakes are made and lives lost. Every agent which goes into families among inexperienced persons should be kept in a safe place, labeled properly and used with care.

The prize Christmas-card design in London, like that in America, was won by a young lady. Nine hundred works were sent in there in response to an offer of a first prize of only $500—one-half the American prize. This throng of competitors is a faint sign of the number of persons taking to art in England in the reign of the good Queen Victoria, and, as America follows suit at a due interval, of the number there soon will be here.

Myriads of people sacrifice themselves through carelessness. They are attacked with a Cold, neglect it and die, instead of taking Dr. Bull's Cough Syrup and living on usefully. Price 25 cents a bottle.

Curious Election Bets.

The following were some of the strange wagers made concerning the Presidential election of 1880:

The loser in a Memphis bet had to stand on his head five minutes, in a public square, with a Garfield banner suspended from his feet.

In Oswego, N. Y., a groceryman bet his store against a neighboring meat market that Hancock would be elected. He turned over his wager like a man, but the butcher declined to accept it.

A combination bet was made by ten Democrats and ten Republicans in Houston, Tex. The losers were to harness themselves to a stage-coach and draw the winners through the principal street. In both parties were some of the foremost men of the city.

Geo. P. Knowls, of Racine, Wis., won from Edwin Childs, of Dakota, one section of good farm land, 640 acres. The bet was $3,000 against a certain described section that New York State would give Garfield from 1,000 to 5,000 Republican majority.

In Ogdensburg, N. Y., William Alger bet his mustache against A. A. Babcock's whiskers that Garfield would not be elected. Alger had his mustache cut off and sent to Mr. Babcock.

A wheelbarrow bet in Baltimore afforded more amusement to the spectators than had been expected. The loser was annoyed, while wheeling the winner over the stipulated route, by the taunts of the latter, and followed up the payment of the wager by whipping him soundly.

Joseph S. Miller and Henry Kleindients, of Rochester, N. Y., bet on the election, the loser to walk a block at noon attired in his wife's night-dress. Miller lost, and at noon on the day after election appeared and walked in Mrs. Miller's night-gown, followed by a crowd of men and boys.

A Harrisburg man was caught by a tricky offer of a wager that one city of the United States of over 100,000 inhabitants would not give 500 votes for Hancock. The stake was a supper for the ward campaign club of the winner. The city named was Washington, where there is no vote for President at all. The victim said nothing, except to name the time and place for the supper. On that occasion the viands looked all right, and were just as the written terms of the bet called for, but they were found to be seasoned with snuff and other unpalatable substances.

[From the Bay City Tribune.]

Dr. A. A. Pratt, of this city, says: St. Jacobs Oil is splendid. All to whom I have sold it pronounce it the best medicine for rheumatism and pain they ever used.

Journalistic Enterprise.

There is nothing so encouraging to the proprietor of a great modern journal as to be able to make improvements on his organ. Artemus Ward tells a good story about a visit he made to the sanctum of the Bungtown Bugle, and the interesting interview he had with the editor. The editor was preparing his leading editorial, which he read over to Artemus. It was to the effect that "we have just had some extensive repairs made to our sink. A new bottom has been placed in it at an immense expense, in which two holes have been bored, through which the water passes into the entirely new bucket below. What has the hell-hound of the Gazette to say to this? We shall continue to make improvements as great and exhaustive as our rapidly increasing circulation will justify. We have also about closed a contract for the purchase of a new paste-pot."

It was the same editor of the Bugle who got out an extra with big headlines announcing:

"The course of the Bugle indorsed by the people. One more subscriber yesterday."

The same paper also claimed that it had trebled its circulation, which was a fact, for at the time it had three subscribers instead of one, the number it started out with.

A Monkey's Suicide.

One of the most novel deaths that ever occurred in this section took place here to-day, the victim of which was a monkey owned by Mr. Rockwell Syrock. The animal was quite a favorite with all the children for miles around, and knew most of them. For several years past Jocko's owner has been in the habit of visiting all the hangings in this portion of the State, taking the mischievous animal with him, who always seemed to take an especial interest in the horrible details of such proceedings. On the 25th of June Alex Howard, a negro, was to have been executed here for the murder of an old man, but the Governor respited him. The gibbet was erected and all the preliminary arrangements made for carrying out the negro's sentence, when the Executive interposed his power and postponed it. Syrock visited the jail with the monkey, and examined these preparations. The animal seemed to be unusually curious, and watched the scaffold trap with wistful eyes. Since that time he has been playing hanging in his master's barn. This morning he was found dead, suspended by a clothes-line to one of the rafters of the building.—Goldsboro (N. C.) Cor. Chicago Times.

Sicilian Proverbs.

The Sicilians are a rude folk, if judged by their proverbs, some of which are printed in the Debats as follows:

"He who hasn't a wife knows not the devil."

"A woman who goes to every fete and a mule that drinks at every fountain, is no good."

"He who gets married is contented for a day; he who kills a pig has enough for a year."

"God keep thee from a man who looks on the ground, and a woman that looks at the sky."

"There is only one devil and he has 100 wives."

"Women have a devil for every hair."

There is a good deal of feeling in Washington over the fact that Mr. Hayes insists on having the White House "banked up" for winter, the same as farm houses in Ohio are banked up, with "maneuver" from the barn-yard. Fashionable residents of Washington stick up their noses at it, but Mr. and Mrs. Hayes insist that the flavor is not unpleasant, and that potatoes and apples keep better in the cellar when the house is banked up that way.—Peck's Sun.

The Distillation of Spirits.

The following statistics are furnished by the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. The figures indicate the number of gallons of distilled spirits produced, consumed, exported, &c., the fiscal years ending June 30th. The marked increase of consumption the past year is attributal to the revival of manufacturing industries, the larger portion of the consumption of spirits in this country being as is well known to all except prohibition lecturers—used in the arts:

	1880.	1879.
Production	90,355,270	71,892,621
Consumption	61,116,529	61,892,714
Exportation	16,765,669	14,837,581
Balance in bond	31,368,860	19,212,470

A couple of Galveston negroes were talking politics. One of them asked Uncle Mose: "I say, Mose, what is de meanin' of a silver-tongued orator? I has read dat spression in de paper, and it sorter stumped me." Old Mose, who never failed to answer any question ever asked him, responded at once: "A silber-tongued orator is one who neber goes back on his word when he promis you a silber half-dollar for votin' for him." "Dat ar species a mighty skurse in Galveston—dat's all I'se got ter say."—Galveston News.

New England farmers are turning attention to wheat culture. For some years wheat has been considered one of the crops that New England agriculture had outgrown; but of late, notwithstanding that lands there are much more broken than at the West, it appears, from the experience of the past six years, as large crops can be raised in each of the New England States as can be or are grown at the West, and it is probable that quite a revival of the wheat industry will be witnessed there another year.

Dogs as Sheep-Protectors.

In many portions of this country it seems to be impossible to render the keeping of sheep profitable on account of the ravages of dogs. Land is cheap, and both wool and mutton high, but the losses by dogs and the expense of protecting sheep from them consumes all the profits. In various parts of South America dogs are relied on to protect sheep, not only from the attacks of wild beasts but from the worthless dogs that range over the country. Darwin states that the shepherd dogs kept there are as much attached to the sheep as most dogs are to their masters. They are brought up with the flocks and have no other companionship. The puppies are taught to suckle ewes, and are adopted by them. A California sheep-raiser states that a similar course is adopted in Germany, with the best results. In a communication he says: "There, in general, the shepherd stays with his sheep all the time, day and night, and he has, according to the number of his flock, one or more dogs, a kind I never saw before nor have seen anywhere else. It resembles in size the Newfoundland, but its hair is bushy, long, and partly curled. This breed of dogs, even when puppies, are never allowed to see anything but members of the herd. It is astonishing to see how these dogs and sheep fraternize with each other. The sheep look, in real or imaginary danger, more for the dogs than for the shepherd, and always run to and not, like here, from the dogs. If Americans wish to protect their sheep from strange dogs they must adopt the German system, bring young shepherd dogs from their puppyhood into the company of sheep, educate both to live, eat, and run together, and they soon will find out their true relationship to each other, for the sheep will look upon the dog as a natural protector, which attitude and confidence he proudly will repay by untiring friendship and watchfulness."

THE ANNUAL PILGRIMAGE

Will Soon Set in, and the Question of the Way to Take Becomes an Important One.

Congress assembles on the first Monday of next month, and, as a matter of course, the travel from this section to the national capital will be large. Owing to the prospective change in the new congress, the chances are that the number of pilgrims will be greatly increased. The B. & O. being the only line between the east and the west that runs its trains through Washington, and the only line by which the east is reached direct, it will unquestionably carry a great proportion of this business. In order to meet every requirement and to show passengers what a first-class road means when it promises first class accommodations, new equipment has been added to the road, much of it far superior to any ever placed upon any line of railroad in this country. The new B. & O. sleepers are beyond all comparison; the handsomest cars of the description ever constructed. They are remarkably roomy, and are fitted up in the most artistic manner, while the workmanship through the entire car is wonderfully fine. Much care has been taken to insure the comfort of passengers in these cars, and to this end the seats are higher and more comfortable, the ventilation is better and the accommodations throughout are upon a scale of liberality certainly never before attempted. Especially gratifying improvement to lovers of a good cigar is the room assigned for their gratification. It is three or four times larger than similar rooms in other cars, and is perfectly ventilated. These new cars are attached to all the through trains of the B. & O., and under the new schedule which went into effect Sunday last, the road now runs three through trains daily from Chicago to the east. The 5:15 p. m. train, which reaches Washington an entire night in advance of the fastest 5:15 train on other roads, will have dining cars attached, a new and elegant line having just been completed, which will run in and out of Chicago every day of the week.

The World Made for Boys.

[Buffalo Express.]

Some people imagine that the world was made for men. All a mistake, it was simply intended for boys to amuse themselves in. Who enjoys life except the boy, if we except an occasional girl or two? Nobody. Grown-up folks try to think they do, and some really imagine, but they are mistaken. Men work themselves into a fever of excitement over an election. They hold mass-meetings and get up torch light processions of great length and noisy roar, but do they get any fun out of it? Not a bit, it is the boys on the outside who do that. They are the ones who build the bonfires on the street corners, and they do a large share of the hurrahing. Men in a procession move along as solemnly as though they were going to their own funeral, if such a thing was possible, but the boy who observes them from the curbstone, or who trots along close to the drum major, is all animation and joy. He takes it all in, and is the freshest one in the party when the tramp is completed no matter how long he is in passing a multitude of given points. No one gets such keen enjoyment out of a play as the gallery-god. And all circuses in the country are gotten up with an eye single to his special amusement. If we could be a girl again we would prefer to be a boy.

Remarkable Occurrence.

A case of remarkable recovery after apparent death is reported by a Sweedish newspaper. A landed proprietor in the neighborhood of Christiania, died, or apparently died, after a short illness. His body had been laid in the coffin, the lid of which, however, was not screwed down, in a room where some fire-wood happened to be kept. The evening of the same day the widow sent her doughter, a child ten years old, into the room to get some of the fire-wood, and, as the child was hastily gathering an armful, she heard her name called in a low voice. She sprang down stairs in alarm, and several persons hurried up to the room to find the supposed dead man in perfect possession of his senses, and apparently quite well, although dreadfully shocked at finding himself in a coffin. He described his sensations on recovering consciousness as those of a man upon awakening from a pleasant and refreshing sleep.

Where Banging Began.

[Columbia (S. C.) Register.]

It has been a subject of wonderment to us where our pretty girls got the notion of combing their front hair down over their foreheads and cutting off the ends so as to make the inch and a half of hair which they keep hanging down nearly to their eye-brows, and which is irresistibly associated in our mind with an imperfectly sheared mule's tail. The mystery was solved to our satisfaction the other night as we dropped into Dr. Jackson's. The doctor received from New Zealand lately, among quite a variety of ferns and mosses and other curiosities from that semi-barbarous land, the pictures of two Maori—the natives of that country—a boy and a girl, and the latter had her back hair all looped upon the top of her head and stuck through with white-tipped turkey feathers, and the front hair was hauled down in front, the ends mingling with the eyebrows. So it is from the New Zealand savages, and not from the American Indian squaws, ladies, that you copy the fashion. "Nuff said."

Advise to Young Men.

Remember, son, that the world is older than you are by several years; that for thousands of years it has been so full of smarter and better young men than yourself, that their feet stuck out of the dormer windows; that when they died the old globe went whirling on, and not one man in ten millions went to the funeral. Don't be so sorry for your father because he knows so much less than you do.

Remember the reply of Dr. Wayland to the student of Brown university, who said that it was easy enough thing to make proverbs, such as Solomon wrote. "Make a few," tersely replied the old man. The world has great need of young men, but no greater need than the young men have of it. Your clothes fit you better than your father's fit him; they cost more money, and they are more stylish; your mustache is neater, the cut of your hair is better. But young man, the old gentleman gets the largest salary, and his homely, scrambling signature on the business end of a check, will drain more money out of the bank in five minutes than you could get out with a ream of paper and a copper-plate signature in six months.—Burlington Hawkeye.

SIX SCORE YEARS OLD.

"And Dah As Is My Age," Contends Old Tildy Johnson.

[Cincinnati Enquirer.]

It is said that there are enough pieces of the "true cross" now treasured up by the credulous of the world to build a Great Eastern. It is probable that within the last half century enough "vertible" body-servants, cooks and "every-day niggers" originally belonging to George Washington have been developed to stock every plantation in the Palmetto state. One of them was discovered yesterday near the colored Baptist church in Cumminsville, and she claimed to have reached the rather mature age of one hundred and twenty summers. Her name is Matilda Johnson. She has not lived in the Twenty-fifth ward very long, but was a resident of the city proper for over a dozen years. An Enquirer reporter called to see the venerable negroe, or "Grand-mother Tildy," as all her neighbors call her, yesterday. Tildy is a stout old woman, has her white, wooly head covered with the invariable bandana a la turban, and has been utterly toothless for a quarter of a century. Her memory does not seem much impaired; she talks of events of seventy or eighty years ago as if they were but of yesterday. In answer to the question as to where she was born Grandma Tildy said: "I was bo'n in Africa," and then the old veteran, calling up one of her ancient ditties, and in a childish manner sang:

"Af'ican bred,
Af'ican bo'n,
Old nigga dead,
Af'ican gone."

"I was brought to dis country when I was 'bout 'leven yea's ole. Dey bro't me 'long wid my mudder, and when only a little pickaninny I was sold to Massa George Washington. Oh, yo' may laf, but I was his little nigga, sahtin, shu'. I 'member him jes as well as I 'member I didn't sleep well last night. I growed up and became his cook. I 'member how he cotched cold, and dat was his 'deaf' a cold"—

"Well, grandma, how do you know you are of so remarkable an age?" interrupted the reporter.

"Know, honey? know, did ye say? D'ye think I'd tell anything but de trufe 'bout dis yer age? I knows I'se nearly hundred and twenty. I lived in Richmond—old Richmond, Virginny, almost de age of man, and den I went up to Fredericksburg and lived awhile, and den I came ober into old Lexington, Kentucky, and lived anudder age of man."

"Were you ever married?"

"Bress yo' heart, honey, guess I was married. My first old man was Walker Johnson, and I lived wid him jes forty-nine years. Den he died, an' I stayed a widow fourteen or fifteen years, and den married Reuben Ross. We den b'longed to Henry Payne. I was Mrs. Ross for fifteen yea's, and den Reub he died, and I didn't get married no mosh."

"How long ago did Reub die?"

"Must be right onto twenty years. One ob my youngest chillen now lives ober in Covington, and she is seventy-five years ole an' looks good deal older'n I, she has been sick good deal. Her name is Rosina Douglas, and she—"

"You had a good many children, didn't you, grandma?" interrupted one of the people who occupy the same house with Mrs. Johnson.

"No I didn't hab a good many either," answered the old woman, excitedly. "You think I was an old grist-mill? I I only had fifteen childrens, an' bress deir hearts, dey is nearly all dead." Then turning to the reporter, the old negress resumed: "If I is old, I'm hearty. I can run a race now. If yo' bet yo' money I couldn't get up and git, yo' lose it sahtin, shu'."

The probability is that Mrs. Johnson has miscalculated somewhat, and that she has not reached her one hundred and twentieth year. That she is very old, however, upward of a hundred years, there can be no doubt. She is certainly an interesting specimen handed down to us from the eighteenth century.

Four weeks ago Mrs. Mary Mayer, of 493 First street, Jersey City, died of typhoid fever and was buried. The body appeared life-like, and the cheeks after death were highly colored. This preyed upon the mind of a daughter of the deceased to such a degree that she caused the remains to be exhumed. It was then discovered that the woman had turned on her face in the coffin, and that in her struggles she had torn one ear almost off.

Governor Foster, it seems, paid $3,800 for John Sherman's campaign debts and wants his money back. Strange to say, Sherman doesn't know he owes Foster anything. That is probably one of Sherman's methods employed in making a fortune.

A FEMALE ENOCH ARDEN.

A New Bedford Woman's Husband Committed Unintentional Bigamy.

[San Francisco Chronicle.]

John Marshall, a Portugese, whose real name is Decunha, married a Miss Mary Paul in New Bedford, Mass., in the year 1866. After a few years of married life, Mrs. Marshall left for the western islands, and for over five years her husband heard nothing of her whereabouts. The wifeless husband came to San Francisco eventually, and sighing for a renewal of conjugal bliss, married Miss Eliza Morehouse in December last, both parties acting in good faith, and believing that the first Mrs. Marshall was no longer in the land of the living. In the course of events the second Mrs. Marshall presented her liege lord with a bouncing baby, and all was serene until the sudden appearance of the first Mrs. Marshall. The first love having returned, the much-married Marshall saw a solution of the matrimonial enigma, and brought suit to have the second marriage annulled; that the second Mrs. Marshall have the privilege of resuming her maiden name of Morehouse, and further praying that the legitimacy of the child be established, and that he be allowed to assume the expenses of its education, as he is fully competent to do so. Mr. Marshall and Mrs. Marshall No. 2 and the baby, appeared before Judge Allen, November 15, all parties consenting that the matrimonial ties between them be dissolved. A number of witnesses were examined, and the facts as above being given, the case was taken under advisement.

Epizooty.

At the request of a subscriber, we publish the following homeopathic treatment of this disease, recommended by Dr. J. W. Johnson, in the Ohio Farmer:

"Treatment given from the first will remove all danger in three days, and secure perfect recovery in from ten to fifteen days, in ninety per cent. of all cases. Apply Caustic Balsam, one-half ounce, on the throat of the animal and between the jaws, thoroughly rubbed in for ten minutes. One application will be sufficient to check the progress of the disease. Internal treatment is indispensible to aid nature to throw off the poison and eradicate the disease from the system. Ferrum phos. 3d, one ounce for each animal, dissolved in one pint of soft water; give one-half ounce at a dose three times a day. In severe cases a dose should be given every three hours until the above quantity has been consumed, which will cause the animal to throw off profusely. Then follow with kali mur. 3d, one-half ounce to one pint of water; mix, and then give one-half ounce three times a day. If the animal should break out in pustular eruption, cracked heels, scratches, etc., use kali sulph. 3d, instead of kali mur. in the same form, which should always be given after the use of ferrum phos., to complete a cure."

A Sad Scene in Court.

A delicate old man with silvery hair approached the bench of Jefferson Market police court to-day, and in tremulous tones addressed Justice Murry as follows:

"Your Honor, I came to-day to ask your assistance in behalf of my unfortunate daughter."

"Where is she?"

"There," said the old man, pointing to a dark-haired young woman of twenty-four, who stood at the bar shaking from the effects of a drink. "She was married three years ago, but begining shortly after her marriage to take a glass of ale or beer with some so-called friends who called to see her, she has gone down until her husband was compelled to leave her, and I had to take her to my home again, a habitual drunkard. I was compelled to cause her arrest last night, so violent did she become."

The tears rolled down the wrinkled cheeks of the old man as he related his painful story. Justice Murry expressed his opinion that it would be well to send her on the island for six months.

"For God's sake, for the sake of my child, please don't send me to jail. I will promise you on my knees never again to touch rum," said she, making an attempt to kneel.

"Father! father!" cried she, as he raised her up. "Forgive me, and have mercy."

The father was unable to speak, but signified, by sighs, his desire to give her another trial and she was allowed to go with him out of the court.—Free Press.

The London Times.

The London Times consists invariably of sixteen pages, about nine of which are filled with advertisements. It is frequently necessary to make application for space a week in advance. The English, like the Americans, soon find out which newspapers pay the best to advertise, in, and, while the Times has not half the circulation of the Daily News and Telegraph, it goes to that class of readers who have money to spend—the aristocracy, the bankers, and the merchants. And then again, while the price of the Times limits its circulation it is the best-borrowed paper in the world, and thousands read it at the news-rooms, clubs, and dining-rooms who do not pay for it. Like the Daily and other papers of the same class, the Times admits no cuts. It is not defaced by pictures of circus shows, and of using sozodont. Nothing offensive to good taste or morality is ever admitted to the Times. Its respectability throughout is never questioned. It was, under Mr. Delane, a mode of correct English. It was next to impossible to detect in it an error in grammar or a fault in style. If Dr. Johnson or any equal of his had been the proof-reader the paper could hardly have been more faultless. It gave heavy reading, but there was no shock to the nerves of a sensitive scholar.

Might Give a Wrong Impression.

The Lincoln Guards, colored, were marching down street Galveston, en route to the picnic grounds, behind a loud brass band. Standing at the corner, in front of a saloon, where two local politicians who have a great deal of influence with the colored voters. One of the politicians was very much annoyed by a large fly that persisted in buzzing about his nose in spite of the efforts made to drive it away. A scared look came over the face of the second politician, and he asked his companion, "Have you got $10 about you."

"No, I've not got a cent," responded the other, making a still more violent pass at the obnoxious insect.

"Then, for heaven's sake, quit making those motions."

"Why?" responded the other, waiving his paw more violently than ever at the the fly.

"because those colored troops will think you are motioning to them to come in and have some beer, and they will stack arms and accept the invitation."

The fly had it all its own way after that.

The 329 Puzzle.

Some ingenious individual has discovered a new way to interest the public in the figures 329. He has invented a puzzle, the solution of which we leave to professional mathematicians. His scheme is about as follows: "Take any given number, multiply it by 2, add 674 to the result, divide this by 2, add 3 to the number first chosen and subtract this amount from the number left after dividing, and the answer will be 329. For instance, take the number 16 and work it thus:

```
  16
   2
 ----
  32
 674
 ----
2)706
 ----
 353
  24
 ----
 329
```

This can be done with any number.

Mackerel.

Some fish have strange peculiarities connected with their travels. Thus we are told that the mackerel spend their winter in what would appear to others a most uncomfortable position. In the Artic, as well as the Mediterranean, as as soon as winter comes, they deliberately plung their head and their anterior part of their body into deep mud, keeping their tails erected, standing up. This position they do not change until spring, when they emerge in incredible numbers from their hiding-places, and go sourtward for the purpose of depositing their eggs in more genial waters. Still they are as firmly wedded to this element that they die the instant they are taken out of the water, and then shine with phosphorescent light.

ONE LAST LETTER.

BY LADY LINDSAY.

'Twas but a line, a hurried scrawl,
And little seem the words to say;
Yet hold me in reproachful thrall—
"You quarreled with [illegible] yesterday;
To-morrow you'll be sad."

Aye, "you'll be sad," the words are few,
And yet they pierce my soul with pain!
Aye, "you'll be sad," the words are true;
They haunt me with prophetic strain!
"To-morrow you'll be sad."

We quarreled, and for what? a word,
A foolish speech that jarred the ear,
And thus in wrath our pulses stirr'd;
Then came her letter: "Dear, my dear,
To-morrow you'll be sad."

Few words! half mirth, and half regret,
The last her hand should ever write—
Sad words I learned long ago, and yet
Fraught with new pain to-day at sight:
"To-morrow you'll be sad!"

—Macmillan's

In the Palace of Truth.

Richard Turner, Esq., a lawyer, let us hope of future fame, returning home one night in an unenviably bad humor, found a certain dainty little note awaiting him on his mantlepiece. It had just come, his landlady said, and slowly tearing open the envelope, Dick read as follows:

MY DEAR MR. TURNER:—Many thanks for your lovely flowers, which have been greatly admired. It was like your thoughtfulness to remember my birth-day when I had almost forgotten it myself. I was so sorry to have missed your call this afternoon.

Sincerely yours, FLORENCE REDIFER.

A very gracious little note, but for some reason it appeared to afford its reader but small satisfaction. Dick read it twice with a curling lip, then tossing it into the scrap basket, he lit a cigar, stretched himself in an easy chair and thoughtfully observed through the smoke wreaths that began to float around his head: "What a precious little liar she is! As if I didn't see her ten minutes after she was 'not at home' to me this afternoon, start out driving with Tom Baker in that confoundedly jerky dog cart of his. Shouldn't wonder if he had jerked her off before they got home; and served her right too! Why, Snip, what is the matter with you sir?"

Snip was the skye terrier, who, failing to understand why he had been slighted, was seeking to secure his master's notice by sitting upright and waving his front paws to and fro in a gentle and deprecating fashion.

"Did I hurt your feelings, poor little boy?" said Dick, tenderly. "Well, I wouldn't, I assure you, for a dozen little flirts like Florence Redifer, but I do think, Snip, and I expect you to agree with me, that we would all be much better off if women and men, too, would say just truthfully what was in their minds instead of this eternal beating around the bush. Why can't people be a little more candid with their fellow-creatures instead of bowing them to the top of their bent and then laughing behind their backs? Do you know, Snip?"

Snip didn't know, but he was the last dog in the world to confess his ignorance, so assuming a look of wisdom which Solomon might have envied, he gave a mysterious little bark that could mean anything and composed himself to listen.

"Just 3 o'clock," said Dick, consulting his watch. "In two hours I've got to dress and go to Mrs. Grey's ball, the biggest bore of the season I haven't a doubt, but there's no escaping it. Aren't you glad, Snip, you don't have to go to balls?"

Snip barked again, this time in an affirmative manner. He always accommodated himself to his master's moods, and was well accustomed to being questioned. Alert and vigilant, he watched the cigar dwindle down by slow degrees, while he waited in well-bred silence for a renewal of the conversation. But Dick was drowsy and cross, and when the cigar was smoked out he turned his head aside and fell fast asleep, while his little dog curled contentedly around his feet, looking up into his master's face with a world of patient love in his honest brown eyes.

Seven, eight, nine, ten! Was it possible that he had slept nearly two hours and the clock was really striking ten? Dick jumped up, glanced at his watch to make sure, and with a stifled groan prepared to induct himself into his dress suit. This was never a very rapid process with him, and by the time he entered Mrs. Grey's brilliantly lit-up house the great clock in the hall was pointing to a quarter past 11.

The rooms were crowded and stiflingly hot. The very flowers appeared to droop under the glare and the heat, all except some deep red roses which had been arranged in a sentence over the doorway, and whose glowing hearts presented the most sumptuous and intense bit of coloring, even in that many-hued apartment. It was strange, but Dick found himself unable to read that sentence, although composed of only three short words. The language, even the letters, were unknown to him, and for half a minute he stood puzzling over the mystery. Then the incoming crowd gently shoved him aside, and abandoning the effort, he made the best of his way toward his hostess. A pretty little woman, magnificently dressed, but seemingly already much fatigued with the work in hand, she half smiled as Dick edged up to her.

"Have you just come, Mr. Turner?" she said. "I thought you were to be one of my early birds."

"So I would have been," he explained, "only, unfortunately, I fell asleep and did not wake up in time."

"Oh! that was the case, was it? Well, such a lengthy nap ought to brighten you up beautifully for the rest of the evening. Sometimes, you know, you are rather stupid."

Dick looked at her to see if she meant a joke, but her pretty face was gravely raised to his. "You are flattering me," he said, shortly.

"I don't mean to, indeed," she answered, quite earnestly. "But there are plenty of men who are always stupid, while you can be rather entertaining, when you are at your best," and she turned gently from him to greet a new batch of guests.

"Was I ever damned with such faint praise before?" thought Dick. "I wonder if I am 'at my best' to-night?"

For a minute he stood, taking a survey of the scene before him. The musicians were playing a waltz, and playing it well; only strange to say there was a flute among them, which came piping in with its shrill persistent little treble in a manner distracting to Dick's over-sensitive ear. He thought of Mozart's saying that the only thing in the world worse than a flute in an orchestra was two flutes, and wondered at Mrs. Grey's choice in music. Nevertheless, as long as he was there he might as well dance, and looking around for familiar faces, his first glance fell upon a brown-eyed maiden whom he had met at a party only the week before, and whom he had admired with the guarded and half-supercilious admiration of a veteran society man. In another minute they were on the floor contending with their fellow-creatures for a little room to whirl around in, and seemingly successful in their struggle, until a slight lurch sent them rather suddenly against another pair of dancers.

"That was stupid, wasn't it?" said Dick, as they stopped to take breath after the concussion.

"Yes," replied she of the brown eyes, raising them frankly to his face. "You are rather a poor dancer. Perhaps you are out of practice?"

"Indeed I ought not to be," protested Dick, in unutterable indignation at the charge. "I never danced more in my life than I have this winter."

"Is that so? It must be awkwardness then," said his companion, gently. "Some people never can thoroughly learn. I think it is a natural gift."

Dick wondered if he could have heard aright or if that wretched little flute, still piping away so complacently, had absolutely bewildered him. If there was one thing he prided himself on more than another—one gift, natural or otherwise, which he felt sure of possessing—it was his dancing. Was the brown-eyed damsel out of her mind or was she simply an ill-bred little thing, who did not know a good dancer from a bad one? Whichever was the case he lost no time in getting rid of her, and still mute with amazement and disgust, took refuge among a group of men at the door.

"You here, Turner!" said one of them. "I hardly recognized you at first, you look so yellow and thin."

"Do I, indeed?" said Dick, shortly, and wondering what he was doomed to hear next.

"I should rather think you did," was the friendly answer. "I just said to Smith, here, as you came up, that between your sallow skin and that bald spot on your head, you were beginning to look like an old man before your time. Why don't you take to country life and early hours and freshen up a bit?"

"Why don't you mind your own affairs and kindly leave me to attend to mine?" retorted Dick, now thoroughly aroused, and without waiting for another word he veered around and left the group, who, one and all, seemed profoundly astonished at his ill temper.

By this time he began to feel a little uncertain who to approach next. Having been told already that he was stupid, ugly and a bad dancer, what was there left for him to hear. He certainly had never met so many disagreeable people in his life and he had serious thoughts of beating a permanent retreat, when he caught sight of a blonde head half hidden beneath the azaleas in the conservatory. It was Florence Redifer, whom he had never expected to meet to-night and whom two hours ago he would have indignantly avoided. But for some reason his contempt for her flattery and falseness had been strangely modified in so short a time and he felt a positive yearning to listen again to her pretty nothings and to see her blue eyes uplifted with that tender glance of admiring trustfulness to his. It must have cost her a great deal of time and patience to cultivate the glance up to its present perfection and it was unkind, after all, to sneer at the result of such honest and endearing toil.

The next minute he was by her side. She looked very pretty; her fair hair tumbled in some mysterious fashion on the top of her shapely little head; her bright face lit up with smiles, and her white silk gleaming under the colored lamps with a soft and shifting radiance that pleased Dick's cultivated eye. He was not one of those to whom a woman's gown is a matter of indifference.

"I came in here for a little air," she said; "the rooms are so terribly hot, and the whole affair is very stupid. Don't you think so?"

"It has been worse than stupid for me," he answered, laughing. "I have been insulted wherever I went. First, Mrs. Grey told me I was often very stupid; then Miss Vincent, do you know her? She is dancing now with Tom Stern."

"I don't know her; but never mind! What did she say to you?"

"She told me I was awkward and a bad dancer, and intimated that I could never thoroughly learn."

Florence Redifer burst into a laugh as clear and merry as silver bells. "But you know, Mr. Turner," she said, "your best friends do not claim for you that you dance well."

Dick gasped and then recovered; he was getting hardened now. "I always flattered myself I did," he said boldly.

She looked at him in some surprise. "Of course, I don't mean to say," she explained, "that one cannot get around with you at all, but only that you are not very graceful and sure-footed. There are plenty of men here who dance worse—Mr. Simpson, for instance."

"I should hope so," said Dick, as Simpson, a little weak-eyed man, who held his fair partner as if he feared she was packed with dynamite and was in danger every minute of exploding, moved laboriously past the door. "If that is the best you can say for me, Miss Florence, I shall never have the audacity to ask you to dance again," and with a heavy heart he left the conservatory, now fully satisfied he had had enough of Mrs. Grey's ball.

He took a glass of champagne in the supper-room, where its quality was being freely discussed by the young men who lingered there, and went back to pay his parting respects to his hostess. There were still plenty of people about, but a chill seemed to have fallen on them, the dancers were few, and everybody looked bored or discontented. Mrs. Grey was saying the last words to a party of guests who were about taking their departure.

"Such a pity it should have been a failure," he heard one of them whisper in a tone of sympathy. "And after all the expense you have gone to!"

"I am sure, then, it must have been the fault of my guests," returned Mrs. Grey, "for I did my part as well as I could. Why, Mr. Turner, are you going so soon? I wonder if you, too, found my party a stupid one?"

She looked so harassed that Dick forgot the grudge he owed her, and would gladly have declared her ball both brilliant and delightful, but the words he wished to say stuck in his throat—he absolutely could not give them utterance. An awful impulse was upon him, and to his own secret horror and dismay he heard himself assuring her the painful truth that it was the most dismal affair he had ever witnessed in his life. Then overwhelmed with shame at his involuntary rudeness he turned away, and his eyes fell upon the crimson roses still blooming freshly over the doorway.

What an idiot he must have been! There in plain English letters were the three words, "Palace of Truth." As he looked and read, the magic flute pealed forth so loudly and with so shrill a triumph in its tone that Dick fairly jumped, and in the violence of his start kicked the sleeping Snip, who leaped out of his master's way and gazed at him with reproachful, wonderful eyes.

"Eleven o'clock, as I am a living man!" said Dick, yawning. "Three hours asleep and no ball for me to-night. Snip, you little villain, why didn't you awaken me?"

Snip was silent. He felt the arrant injustice of this remark, and bore it with the equanimity of a stoic.

"Well," said his master, slowly, as he lit his candle, "since you did not, and as I have had all the dissipation and all the candor I need for one night, I think, little dog, that you and I will go peaceably and gratefully to bed."

Secretary Thompson's Report.

The report of the Secretary of the Navy, says a Washington telegram, "deals with measures of the highest importance to the country. His recommendations for rebuilding the navy, apart from a purely military view of the subject, are of vital concern to our commercial interests. The Secretary sets forth the facts in the case with great force, and contends that the only true plan of relief is by first supplying the necessary means to rebuild the navy, so as to enable it to encourage what there is left of our commercial marine endeavoring to regain its lost supremacy. The Secretary makes special reference to the condition of this particular interest, and says that from 1820 to 1860 American ships carried over 81 per cent. of the ocean commerce between our own and foreign ports, and our tonnage rose from 5,000,000 to 80,000,000. Since 1861, through the effects of the rebellion, this has decreased, and now stands about 30 per cent. freight and 7 per cent. of passengers, and giving the American $300,000,000 and foreign ships $900,000,000 on freight and passengers in ten years. He further adds that at the ratios stated, the farmers, planters, manufacturers and all others engaged in industries will soon be at the mercy of ship-owners, who impose on them oppressive burdens and a drain of money which will soon ruin them."

From the Secretary's report we learn that the United States navy in commission consists of but 29 steamers, 4 sailing ships, 8 monitors, and 2 torpedo boats, and for purposes of actual naval warfare, as now conducted, it is doubtful whether, of the 43 vessels, any except the monitors can be reckoned available. Forty-four vessels, among which are 7 additional monitors, are reported "in ordinary."

Secretary Thompson will recommend the passage of a law authorizing the establishment at the Naval Academy of a grade of Cadet Constructors. At present there is no law authorizing the instruction of constructors, and although the construction of a ship lies at the very foundation of the navy the Government is educating no cadets for this branch of the service. Mr. Thompson would put Cadet Constructors upon the same footing with Cadet Engineers and Cadet Midshipmen, as he thinks it is quite as important to the Government that it should have in its service men competent to build ships as to have those who can construct the engines in them, sail them, or fight with them.

Wholesale Poisoning at a Wedding Festival.

A Cincinnati telegram to the Chicago Tribune says: Further particulars are received here to-night of the terrible poisoning case in Tennessee. The marriage of Joel Hembrie and Miss Jane Dale, of Roane county, drew a large company of the friends and relatives, who belong to prominent families in the vicinity. The wedding had long been talked of, and was the social event of the year. After the ceremony the company were invited to the hospitable board of Col. Dale, the bride and groom in the meantime withdrawing. The table was bountifully supplied and all ate heartily. The evening was spent in festivities, and at a late hour another meal was served. After the second meal several guests began complaining of illness, but it was laughed off, and the gayety continued. About 11 p. m. a sudden lethargy seemed to overtake the whole company, and in a few minutes twenty-seven were unconscious. The few who retained consciousness set themselves at work to resuscitate their companions, but without avail. Twelve were removed to other houses in the neighborhood, and as the news spread the whole country around was aroused with excitement, as nearly every prominent family had members present at the fatal feast. Such medical aid as could be summoned could give little relief, and in two days after the occurrence six of the wedding guests were dead. Robert Dale, the bride's brother, died next day. Mike May, a relative of the groom, died in a few hours. Albert Gallagher and Miss Mattie Lovelace, well-known young people, died next day. Two young girls, Emma Peters and Kate Lowry, died within twenty-four hours.

Col. Dale and wife are very low, and their death is momentarily expected.

The cause of the tragedy was using arsenic instead of salt for the seasoning of chickens. Col. Dale purchased a quantity of arsenic a day or two before to kill crows, and carelessly left it in the kitchen. A blundering servant mistook it for salt, and hence the fatal results.

None but those who partook of the chicken were poisoned.

Report of the Chief of the Secret Service.

The annual report of Chief Brooks shows that, during the year, the secret service made forty-three arrests, of which twenty-three were for dealing in counterfeit money. The aggregate sentence of the persons arrested was 343 years, and the amount of fines $41,712. The amount of the counterfeit money captured was $37,788, together with a large number of plates and other contraband material. Owing to the reduction made by the Committee on Appropriations it was necessary to greatly reduce the secret-service force, and also to reduce the salaries of those who were retained at least 20 per cent. This, the Chief says, has done much to interfere with the efficiency of the service. The amount expended by the service during the fiscal year was $61,108. Chief Brooks says that it is necessary to the efficiency of the service that $100,000 be appropriated.

Among the counterfeits discovered during the year were a $50 note on the National Bank of Troy, a $10 note on the United States treasury, issue of 1875, a $100 note on the Pittsburgh National Bank of Commerce, a $5 note on the Montpelier National Bank, a $100 note on the National Exchange Bank of Baltimore, a $100 United States treasury note, and the $1,000 counterfeit United States bond. Of the dangerous $100 counterfeit note only twenty-two have been received at the National-Bank Redemption Agency, and only fifteen others are known to the secret service to be outstanding.

In the matter of executive clemency, Chief Brooks recommends the adoption of a modification of the French police system, by which the criminal set at liberty before the expiration of his sentence shall be compelled at stated times to report his whereabouts to the Government, or be considered and treated as a fugitive from justice. The adoption of such a system, he thinks, would have a beneficial effect in the way of reforming criminals.

ANNUAL REPORT OF THE POSTMASTER GENERAL.

The annual report of the Postmaster General begins with the remark by Mr. Maynard that as he took charge of the department only on the 25th of August last he speaks of it historically and as he finds it, with little reference to his own administration, which did not commence until after the expiration of the fiscal year with the transactions of which the present report is chiefly concerned. The report presents a large amount of statistical information concerning the operations of the department. Attention is called to the statement of Assistant Postmaster General Brady respecting the star service transportation and last year's deficiency, as "worthy careful consideration. To have restricted the postal service to the meager appropriation for 1879 would have rendered it entirely inadequate to the wants of the people." He further says he has carefully reviewed the estimates submitted by Gen. Brady for the next fiscal year's mail transportation in all its branches, and approves all of them as being in accordance with the probable requirements of the service. An appropriation is recommended for continuance of special mail facilities on railroads, such as extra trains with mails only, and acceleration of regular trains carrying mails, etc., which the people have enjoyed for several years past. The report further says: "It is not doubted that regular and frequent means of mail steamship communication with Mexican, Central American, South American, and trans-Pacific ports would prove important auxiliaries to American commerce, and I think it would be a wise measure of public policy to encourage, by appropriate legislation, the establishment by our own citizens of American lines of steamers to such of said ports as will, in the judgment of Congress, promote our commercial interests. I think it would be a wise measure to so amend the general law on the subject as to authorize the payment by the Postmaster General of just and reasonable compensation, within a prescribed maximum limit, and commensurate with the importance of the services performed, to such lines of American steamers as may be employed under contract with this department in transporting mails of the United States to Mexican, Central American, South American, and trans-Pacific ports.

"The money-order system continues to grow in popular favor. The Superintendent of the money-order system suggests a plan for reduction of fees which seems to me entirely feasible, and which is commended to the attention of Congress. Briefly stated, his plan is to reduce the fee for money-orders not exceeding $5 to 5 cents, and to extend the maximum limit of an order from $50 to $100, so that increased commissions received from large orders may offset the loss resulting from the reduced fee for small orders."

The foreign money-order business and operations of letter-carrier system are reported in a highly-satisfactory condition.

Mr. Maynard renews the recommendations of his predecessor for legislative authority to accept and to carry into effect the provisions of an article of the Universal Postal Union Convention concluded at Paris on the 1st of June, 1878, respecting payment of limited indemnity for registered articles of the Postal Union, the origin and address of which may be lost or stolen during transmission through the mails; and also for such modification of the provisions of the act of March 3, 1879, as will authorize the adoption by the Secretary of the Treasury and Postmaster General of regulations providing for the delivery by mail to addresses at offices of destination in the United States, subject to payment of customs duties thereon, on any packet of dutiable mail matter received in mails from foreign countries. He is of opinion, also, that authority to transmit and deliver dutiable articles of mail matter to addresses through the mails, subject to payment of customs duties thereon, should not be restricted to such mail matter as is now exchangeable in the universal Postal Union mails, but should embrace all articles of dutiable matter received in mails from other countries.

The Postmaster General suggests the establishment of a "postal-savings" system, and also of postal telegraphs in this country, in the following terms: "One of my predecessors some years since recommended incorporation into the department of a system of postal savings. The subject has from time to time occupied the attention of Congress. For several years the system has been in operation in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and Canada. When in London, recently, her Majesty's Postmaster General kindly gave me facilities for observing the management of his department. I learned that the postal-savings system had been remarkably successful, and had substantially grown in popular favor. As managed in that country it is a source of some profit to the Government. In this country I incline to the belief that the system would have advantages even greater than in a compact population like that of Great Britain. In by far the larger portion of the United States there are no savings depositories, and are not likely to be. To people of those parts the use of the postoffice for this purpose would be a great boon. It would be an additional advantage that deposits would be available at any depository office in the United States—an important consideration with a people so migratory as ours. It is believed the system would interfere little with the business of savings banks, but would absorb funds now not deposited in them. Nor would the patronage of the Government be sensibly increased, since the system would be operated by persons already in public service, with no considerable addition to the number. Your attention and the attention of Congress is respectfully invited to it.

"During my visit to the British postoffice I examined with much interest the system of telegraphy for several years past connected with the postal service. This method of correspondence is thought to have made great advance since it was changed from the management of private corporations, responsible to nobody, hardly to public opinion, and placed under control of the Government. The business has increased many fold, the cost of sending messages has been largely reduced, and the service is performed in localities it would never have reached under the pecuniary stimulus of private enterprise. At the same time it yields a margin of profit to the royal treasury. Is it not time for us to renew the inquiry whether it is wise to leave this important instrument of correspondence in charge of corporations whose primary object is gain to the managers and stockholders, and the convenience of the public secondary only?"

Mr. Maynard renews for consideration of Congress the suggestion made by his predecessor, that the word "fraudulent," as it occurs in sections 3,929 and 4,041 of the revised statutes, preceding the word "lottery," should be stricken out. He says: "That Congress, while expressly forbidding the use of the ordinary mail to all lottery companies, whether fraudulent or not, should intend to afford a special security of registry system and convenience and safety of the money-order system to persons engaged in employments declared by the Supreme Court of the United States to be 'demoralizing in their effects, no matter how carefully regulated,' unless express proof of fraud can be made against such companies, is not to be assumed. Congress will not intentionally aid in demoralizing the public by affording extraordinary postal facilities to persons or companies whose business accomplishes this result."

He further says that the legal positions taken by his predecessor concerning the power of the Postoffice Department to exclude lotteries from the use of the mails meet his approval, and under the recent decision of the United States Supreme Court, in the case of Stone vs. The State of Mississippi, he has felt it to be his official duty also to give full effect to the actions of any State Legislature in its effort to relieve the public from the evil consequences of pernicious legislation in the past.

Before leaving the subject Mr. Maynard renews the recommendation of Postmaster Gen. Key that newspapers containing lottery advertisements be deprived of the privileges of the mails.

The Census Bureau.

Gen. Francis A. Walker, Superintendent of the Census, in his regular annual report to the Secretary of the Interior, says that although the work of taking the tenth census is substantially complete (the returns having been received from all but seven of the total number of 34,365 enumeration districts), it will probably be two or three weeks before the office will be able to present complete statistics of the population of the country, and he therefore considers it advisable to postpone to a future report all mention of the results of the enumeration, and also all discussion of methods in use as well as any suggestions which may require to be made of changes in the census law with reference to future enumerations. The Superintendent says that every year and every month which can be saved in the compilation and publication of census statistics adds appreciably to their value, and recommends that Congress be asked to authorize the printing by special contract under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, and, if it be thought desirable, also of the Printing Committees of the two houses of Congress, of the several reports of the census as fast as prepared. The accounts of 28,410 enumerators have already been settled, involving a total expenditure of upward of $1,820,000. Only about 4,200 accounts remain unadjusted, and there is no reason to doubt that the month of December will see all the enumerators paid for their services, except only in cases where a suspension is required for reasons unmistakably connected with some fault of the enumerator.

The annual production of wheat in the United States, the exports of wheat, including flour, and the remaining supply for domestic use, compare for five years, each year ending June 30, as follows:

	Production, bushels.	Exports, bushels.	Remaining, bushels.
1875-76	292,136,000	74,750,682	217,385,318
1876-77	289,356,500	57,043,936	232,312,564

1879-80	448,755,118	180,304,169	268,450,950

If the domestic requirements shall be 275,000,000 bushels during the current year, there will remain 205,000,000 bushels for export, or 25,000,000 more than in the preceding year.

Sea-Water in Disease.

A writer in the Bulletin Generale de Therapeutique states that sea-water acts as an alterative in such cases as are benefitted by certain saline mineral waters; and, as its continued use increases the appetite, facilitates digestion, quickens nutritive changes, and augments the proportion of red corpuscles in the blood, he recommends it in the following cases: First, during convalescence from acute diseases; second, in the apyretic forms of dyspepsia; third, in neurosis associated with impoverishment of the blood; fourth, in the scrofulous and tuberculous diathesis; and, fifth, in diabetes.

VEGETINE.

Kidney Complaints.

DISEASE OF THE KIDNEYS.

The symptoms of an acute attack of inflammation of the kidneys are as follows: Fever, pain in the small of the back, and thence shooting downward; numbness of the thigh, vomiting, usually at first a deep red color of the urine, which becomes pale and colorless as the disease increases, and is discharged very often with pain and difficulty; costiveness and some degree of colic. In chronic disease of the kidneys the symptoms are pain in the back and limbs, dryness of the skin, frequent urination (especially at night), general dropsy, headache, dimness of sight, indigestion and palpitation of the heart, gradual loss of strength, paleness and puffiness of the face, cough, and shortness of breath.

In diseases of the kidneys the VEGETINE gives immediate relief. It has never failed to cure when it is taken regularly and directions followed. In many cases it may take several bottles, especially cases of long standing. It acts directly upon the secretions, cleansing and strengthening, removing all obstructions and impurities. A great many can testify to cases of long standing having been perfectly cured by the VEGETINE, even after trying many of the known remedies which are said to be especially for this disease.

KIDNEY COMPLAINTS.

CINCINNATI, O., March 10, 1877.

H. R. STEVENS:

Dear Sir—I have used your VEGETINE for some time, and can truthfully say it has been a great benefit to me, and to those suffering from disease of the kidneys I cheerfully recommend it.

Respectfully, O. H. SMITH.

CINCINNATI, O., April 18, 1877.

MR. H. R. STEVENS:

I have suffered several years with the kidney complaint, and was induced to try VEGETINE. I have taken several bottles of your preparation, and am convinced it is a valuable remedy. It has done me more good than any other medicine. I can heartily recommend it to all suffering from kidney complaints.

Yours respectfully, J. S. McMILLEN,

VEGETINE has restored thousands to health who had been long and painful sufferers.

FACTS FOR THE CURIOUS.

Goose Quills from Ocean's Bottom.—One strange discovery of the deep-sea dredging off Rhode Island was a worm inhabiting a quill like a goose quill. The quills were about a foot long, and soon after being taken out of the water grew so hard that they could be, and were, used for pens. They stood up in the mud at the bottom of the sea. The worms inside were opal colored, and, when taken out of their strange tenements, glistened and presented a rather pretty appearance, so far as color was concerned. They were raked up by thousands, and none of the scientific men ever heard of them before.

A Mighty Army.—About 10,000,000 American voters marched to the polls and deposited their ballots for Presidential electors on the 2d day of November last. What a tremendous army! If the 10,000,000 men were divided into little squads or platoons of five there would be 2,000,000 of such squads. Now, giving each squad the space of three yards the 2,000,000 squads would require 6,000,000 yards. The distance between New York and San Francisco is about 3,000 miles. One English geographical mile contains about 2,000 yards, and so 3,000 miles would contain 6,000,000 yards, just the length of the great line.
